Mr. BOUTELLE. That, Mr. Speaker, is precisely in the line of my suggestion, and my point is that I am unaware of any such rule. Paragraph 2 of Rule XVII provides that—

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

That rule seems to prohibit a call of the House except in cases where it is demonstrated that a quorum is not present. Now, if that is the rule, it strikes me that we can not very appropriately send for absent members and drag them in here, when, having a quorum present, we can not even proceed to ascertain by a call whether there are any absent members or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to paragraph 2 of Rule XV, which at its beginning provides that—

In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

The rule to which the gentleman has referred provides that the presence or lack of a quorum shall be ascertained by a count by the Speaker; but we have now got beyond the point where the rule requires the Chair to ascertain the fact by a count. A call has been ordered, and in the continuation of paragraph 2 of Rule XV the gentleman will find set forth the power of the body to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But that is qualified, if the Speaker please, by the words with which the rule begins, "In the absence of a quorum."

The SPEAKER. The rule follows the Constitution in that it provides that fifteen members, including the Speaker, may order a call, but if the gentleman will read the rule he will find that when the call is ordered—

The doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested wherever they may be found.

Now, it seems to the Chair that if the House is in a condition to order a call, then when it is once ordered the majority of those present may, if they desire, continue the call not only until they get a quorum, but until they bring in all the members. There is no limitation on that power.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this whole authority is qualified by the opening words, "in the absence of a quorum," and can only be exercised in the absence of a quorum; and then Rule XVII goes on to show that where a quorum is present we not only have no power to send for absent members, but we can not even ascertain whether they are absent, because we can not have a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The point which the Chair endeavored to make at the moment was this: That, waiving for the present the power of the House, when there is a quorum, to compel the attendance of absence members, yet under paragraph 2 of Rule XV, wherever it appears there is no quorum present, a call may be ordered. Now, the gentleman's point is, as the Chair understands, that immediately upon the appearance of a quorum, the call falls. Where does the gentleman get that idea?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I get that idea from Rule XVII.

The SPEAKER. Rule XV provides that fifteen members, including the Speaker, may order a call; but there is nothing in the rule which says that the call shall be dispensed with when a quorum appears.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Rule XVII provides that—

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

Now, there having been—

The SPEAKER. That point, the gentleman from Maine will understand, if it is good, would have been in order when the motion was made for a call of the House. The gentleman might then have risen and said that under the rules a call could not be ordered until the Speaker had counted to see whether a quorum of members was in attendance. But that point was not made. The House did order a call.

Now, then, the Chair thinks that there is nothing in the rules to negative the position that when a call has been once entered upon the proceeding does not terminate until all the absent members are brought in, or until by an adjournment or by a formal vote of the House proceedings under the call have been dispensed with.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My idea was predicated upon the assumption that a call of the House which demonstrated the presence of a quorum would be equivalent to a count by the Speaker; that if, under Rule XVII, a count by the Speaker disclosing a quorum would prevent the House from having a call, the demonstration of the presence of a quorum under a call would certainly operate the same way—would prevent our going forward with the arrest of absent members under that clause which says they may be brought here in the absence of a quorum.

I desire to say that I have been led further in the discussion of this parliamentary point than I intended when I arose. I am perfectly content to leave this discussion to gentlemen who are more familiar than myself with parliamentary practice and who take more pride than I do in the discussion of such points.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the gentleman takes his seat, will he allow me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman does not deny the power of less than a quorum to compel the attendance of absent members?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then, if less than a quorum can compel the attendance here of all members who are not present, is it possible that a quorum can not do the same thing?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was simply raising the question whether the constitutional provision means what it says, or whether it means more than it says.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, inasmuch as fifteen members, including the Speaker, can compel the attendance of all the other members, I submit to the gentleman that a quorum can do the same.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is a very natural assumption; but it is quite plausible to suppose that under the rules and practice of the House during one hundred years that idea, if well grounded, would have found some concrete expression somewhere. But, as I conceive, the indications of the view of the House are all the other way.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman will observe that the authority given to less than a quorum to compel the attendance of absent members is an extension, not a restriction, of the power of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. In conclusion, I will simply say that my whole suggestion was based upon the idea that whatever may have been in the minds of those who made the Constitution, whatever contingencies they may have intended to provide for, the contingency that they did provide for in express terms was that of there being no quorum present to do business; they provided that a quorum should consist of a majority of the members, and provided further a method by which the House could procure the attendance of a quorum. They may have provided something further on this subject, but I have not seen it.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine certainly knows that the Constitution provides, when a quorum is present—which is a majority of all the members—the House can then do anything within the grant of powers committed to it by the Constitution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon of my friend from Alabama right there. Clause 2 of Rule XVII expressly prohibits the doing of certain things. It says:

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

Mr. OATES. I would ask the gentleman from Maine if he can suppose for a moment that a rule made by the House can overturn a constitutional provision? I am talking of the power of the House under the Constitution itself, and with a majority of the members of the House present constituting a quorum.

I say that under such circumstances the House can do any—thing within the constitutional grant of power. And it became necessary to put the clause in authorizing what has been quoted from the rule, to wit, that fifteen members, including the Speaker, may compel the attendance of absent members, which is in accordance with the constitutional provision which provides that a smaller number than a majority may adjourn from day to day and be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members. It is in order, to enable it to become a House, to secure a majority, which is a constitutional quorum, that that provision has been inserted in the rule. But when that is secured, remember there is no provision which terminates that power. The mere presence of a quorum does not end it.

The House may go on and require the presence of each and every one of its members. If there be one absent the House may require his attendance if it sees fit to so order. And there are manifest reasons why the House should have this power to compel the attendance of absent members beyond the presence of a mere quorum, because you could not pass a proposed amendment to the Constitution, nor could you expel a member for an offense which he may have committed, unless you have two-thirds of the members present to do so; and therefore it seems to me that there is nothing—with all due deference to the gentleman from Maine—that there is nothing in the argument that the power of the House is terminated with the production of the presence of a mere quorum.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama, to whom I reply with great deference because of his experience and ability, and especially in all matters relating to constitutional law, will please observe that the suggestion I have made and repeat here, is based absolutely upon the power vested in the House by the Constitution to make rules for its own guidance.

Mr. OATES. And that is unlimited.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I have assumed that this rule, which has stood for so many years here, which has been quoted and discussed by so many able men than I, had been well considered, and probably was regarded by those who recommended its adoption as within the purview of the Constitution. And if the House had the right to make this rule, it has certainly prohibited itself, under the rule, from doing certain things, amongst others one of the things which it has the right under the Constitution to do.

Mr. OATES. Could the House do that?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, I am not sure; and that is the very subject to which I am calling attention—the constitutional power to make such a rule. It seems to me that it would be very remarkable if such a rule had stood for so many years if it was unconstitutional.

Mr. OATES. While the power of the House to make rules is plenary and unlimited, yet if the House saw proper to make a rule in conflict with any provision of the Constitution, manifestly that rule would be null and void.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Precisely; but the presumption is that a rule which has stood for so many years, if in conflict with the Constitution, would have been abrogated long ago.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know but that a new member, in speaking on a parliamentary question, might have applied to him the terms of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] of being fresh—very fresh. But I know of no reason why an opinion may not be worth something, even from a new member, if it happens to be a correct opinion.

It seems to me that the question is, What is the object to be attained by a call of the House? If it be simply to secure the attendance of a quorum, then the rule would read that "fifteen members with the Speaker, if there be one, may order a call of the House until a quorum of the members is secured, but must then stop." But it does not limit it to that kind of a call. They may proceed until every member is sought out and brought here. The object is to secure the attendance of the absent members—not merely to secure a quorum, but the attendance of the House.

The reason why it is provided that fifteen members may have this power is in order that the House—its members—may be brought here when there is not a quorum: a quorum having the right by general parliamentary law to compel them to come. There is no question in any constitutional parliamentary body but that a quorum may compel absent members to come, and it requires no constitutional provision in order to give it that power.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then why is it specified?

Mr. BUTLER. When less than a quorum undertakes to do that it requires the constitutional provision to give them the power. The object is to secure the presence of the House, and not merely the presence of a quorum, for, of course, a quorum being present may secure the further attendance of its members, revoke leaves of absence, and bring them to the House without a further special provision. In the absence of a quorum the Constitution must provide what may be done. In the presence of a quorum it does not need such a provision, because it has that inherent power. The only reason why it is mentioned is because there must be some way to do it when the House has not the fundamental and parliamentary right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] raised any question. He made a statement.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker, I simply raised the point for the consideration of the Chair. I understand the Chair has ruled on the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the Constitution gives to less than a quorum the right to send for members. He believes that where there is a majority present it can transact business, and part of that business may be the sending for absent members.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair also holds that more than a quorum can send for absentees?

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes; the Chair thinks, in the transaction of business, if the majority feel like having the absentees here, they have a right to bring them all in.

Mr. BROSIUS. May I suggest that the last statement of the Chair would hardly conform to clause 2 of Rule XVII, which specifies a case in which the House can not order a call.

The SPEAKER. There is a provision in the rules that the House can not order a call where the previous question is ordered, unless the Speaker by actual count ascertains the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, had that proceeding taken place? I was not in the House at the time.

The SPEAKER. It had; but no question of order was raised on the motion for a call.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Chair will not pass upon that question.

The SPEAKER. What question?

Mr. BURROWS. The one that is submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS].

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not. The Chair was simply stating what the rules say.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the Chair to hold that if the point had been made under that clause it would have been good.

The SPEAKER. No, the Chair simply says it was not made.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Chair hold that if it had been made it would have been good?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not rule upon that without reflection. The Chair merely stated that the point had not been made.

Mr. BURROWS. I only rose for the purpose of saying I hoped that the Chair would not pass upon that without discussion.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the Chair will not do that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call. I think there is a quorum of Democrats present.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] on the table. As many as favor that motion will, when their names are called, say ay; those opposed no. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 5, nays 163, not voting 160; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentlemen in the Hall of the House during the roll call?

Mr. MARTIN. I was part of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman understands the rule; he must have been in the Hall of the House during the call and failed to hear his name called, otherwise the Chair can not entertain the request.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HAYNES of Ohio with Mr. SCULL, until further notice.

Mr. BOWMAN with Mr. FLICK, for the rest of this day.

Mr. REED. I ask for a recapitulation of the vote.

The vote was recapitulated.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague [Mr. HOUK], but felt that I ought to vote in order to make a quorum.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DICKERSON. As a quorum voted, I desire to withdraw my vote, being paired.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the vote of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DICKERSON] will be withdrawn, as it still leaves a quorum.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to recommit with the instructions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit the report to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to take into consideration the entire subject-matter, including the remarks published in the RECORD by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] under leave to print, the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] animadverting thereupon, and the citations made by the former [Mr. WALKER], or which may be submitted from the records of the debates in the House as tending to show the custom and the usage of the House in regard to the latitude of debate, and to report to the House as soon as may be such measures, if any, as said committee may deem expedient for the reform of any existing abuses in regard to matter printed in the RECORD, and for the preservation of the highest attainable degree of decorum in debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, have I the privilege of speaking to that question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The previous question has been ordered, and that would include the motion to recommit.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask unanimous consent for five minutes to speak to the motion to recommit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to any further debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. Division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 43, yeas 107.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine makes the point that no quorum has voted. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 40, nays 152. not voting 136; as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am paired; and therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am paired with the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CAUSEY]; if he had been here I would have voted "yea."

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. BROSIUS with Mr. CAUSEY, for the rest of the day.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I was present, listening, when my name ought to have been called, and did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's name will be called.

The name of Mr. REED was called, and he voted yea.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 32; noes 123.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER (the question having been taken). Twenty-eight gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. The other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side. It requires one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. I thought, Mr. Speaker, it was one-fifth of the last vote.

The SPEAKER. This is a demand for tellers, and it requires one-fifth of a quorum—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the demand for tellers was refused.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 10, nays 163, not voting 155; as follows:

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 5 o'clock to-day.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 101.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. RICHARDSON (pending the count by tellers). Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The following additional pair was announced.

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina with Mr. STORER, for the rest of the day.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are none and the nays are 147.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move a call of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on that motion that, under paragraph 2 of Rule XVII, a call of the House is not in order after the previous question is ordered unless it shall appear by actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the count returned by the Clerk on the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The rule requires the Speaker to count.

The SPEAKER. The vote just taken shows 147 present; the Chair takes that count.

Mr. REED. Then the Chair declines to count, as the rule requires?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the count of the Clerk upon the roll call, 147.

Mr. REED. The Chair declines to count, as the rule requires?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the count just made on the call of the yeas and nays, 147.

Mr. REED. Does the Chair say that the rule does not require him to make an actual count?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is executing the rule as the Chair understands it, and if that is not satisfactory to the gentleman from Maine that is his misfortune and not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. REED. The Chair need not be petulant about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not petulant, but the gentleman is persistent—

Mr. REED. Of course the gentleman is persistent; that is his right; and the Chair should speak to him respectfully, because he is a coequal member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so does.

Mr. REED. And there should not be any exhibition of temper on the part of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is not; and there should not be any attempt at scolding on the part of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Not at all. Now, I want to ask the Chair if he regards his action as a fulfillment of the requirements of the rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman ought to know that if the Chair did not so regard it the Chair would not so state it.

Mr. REED. Then, as the Chair interprets the rule, it does not require him personally to make a count of the members present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that he adopts the count as made by the Clerk. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. REED. I ask the Chair, under the rule, to count the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that he adopts the count made by the Clerk.

Mr. REED. The rule requires the Chair to count.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will enforce his ruling. If the gentleman objects to any ruling of the Chair, he has all his rights.

Mr. REED. In a House three-fourths Democratic? I guess not.

The SPEAKER. In a House strictly impartial, and which will do justice even to the gentleman from Maine. [Applause on the Democratic side, during which Mr. REED made a remark which was inaudible.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering a call of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise respectfully to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. After the announcement of the last vote by the Chair, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] rose and moved a call of the House. Thereupon, as I understood, the Chair adopted the count which had been had before the motion was made. Now, I submit the Chair would hardly hold that the number of persons present, as disclosed on that roll call, could actually determine the number of those present after other proceedings had been entered upon by the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will understand the Chair has a right to assume that every member of the House discharges his duty.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then we would have 332 members here.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires every member to vote—

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair will not assume that gentlemen present do not vote.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But of course the Speaker is aware that the recognition of supplementary motions and the introduction of new business may, under parliamentary custom, raise a new condition of things. For instance, under the rule that after one motion to adjourn has been made and decided, no other motion to adjourn can be entertained until some other business has been transacted, almost anything in the nature of a motion has been regarded as the transaction of business, so that the parliamentary situation may be entirely changed even in the course of a few minutes or seconds.

Now, I submit that the count reported by the Clerk of a vote, the second call on which began perhaps twenty minutes ago, can not be regarded as disclosing necessarily the number of members present in the Hall, because gentleman who may have entered since their names were called the second time would be precluded from recording their votes.

The SPEAKER. That may be true; but the gentleman understands that this is a call which has just been completed, and the Clerk reports that 147 members have voted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But, Mr. Speaker, may it not be true that thirty or forty additional members may have entered the Hall since their names were called on the second call?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have no desire to trespass upon the patience of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am speaking in perfect good faith.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Take my own case, for instance. I was not here when my name was called on the second call, and I would not be permitted now under the rules to have my name recorded. I merely state this to show that the roll call can not be regarded as necessarily disclosing whether there is or is not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. There may be, as the gentleman suggests, reasons why this is not the best method of ascertaining the number of members present; yet there may be objections to all methods. It seems to the Chair that this is a more correct method than any other.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair kindly ask the Clerk to read the rule?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. OWENS. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. There is a question now before the House.

Mr. REED. The language of the rule requires, I think, "an actual count by the Speaker."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XVII.

The Clerk read as follows:

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

Mr. REED. I submit to the Chair that the language of the rule just read is very strong—"an actual count by the Speaker."

The SPEAKER. A great many things, the Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Maine, that are required to be done by the Speaker are actually done by the Clerk. The rule provides, for instance, that the Speaker shall call the committees each morning for reports; but the present occupant of the chair has almost uniformly directed the Clerk to perform that duty for him.

Mr. REED. The rule, I believe, provides that there shall be an "actual count by the Speaker."

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. REED. It seems that it would be difficult to put it in stronger language.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question with his consent. During the time that you were the Speaker of this House, in the last Congress, I ask whether, when a count was demanded, under the rules of the House, pages were not sent out into the cloakrooms to report the names of members who might be in them, so as to be included in the count?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Well, I have observed pages counting the members in the cloakrooms and reporting that fact to the desk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to debate, under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear the gentlemen.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Chair to say that it is made the duty of each member, by the rules, to be present and vote on all questions submitted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is such a rule.

Mr. ALLEN. I would ask further the question, if the Chair would undertake to assume that gentlemen present have not done their full duty?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not assume that of any gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I hope that none of the gentlemen who are insisting on the Chair doing a certain thing will assume that the Chair would disregard his duty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine, in the utmost good faith, that there may be some question, possibly there is great question, as to whether that rule is a constitutional rule. The provision we have in the rule, which has been read from the desk, is that the Speaker shall determine "by actual count." Now, the Chair adopts the count made on the roll call immediately preceding this motion, and the judgment of the Chair is that that is evidence of the very best possible character of the number present.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Will the Chair permit a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I think there should be added to the list the names of three gentlemen who came in from a committee room, where they have been engaged in committee business, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BUCHANAN], Mr. GOODNIGHT, and myself.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair overrules the point of order, and entertains the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer:

Alderson.	Cooper.	Johnstone, S. C.	Robertson, La.
Amernan.	Cowles.	Ketcham.	Robinson, Pa.
Arnold.	Crain, Tex.	Kyle.	Rockwell.

Coombs.	Johnson, Ind.	Rife.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. STAHLNECKER] be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-seven members have answered to their names.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There being a quorum present, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 107, noes 0.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. REED and Mr. RICHARDSON were appointed tellers.

Mr. SEERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEERLEY. I would like to know whether gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who are paired, as many of them are, are entitled to vote, as some appear to be doing?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Will the gentleman specify a single instance of bad faith?

Mr. REED. Give an actual case.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Let us know who it is.

Mr. SEERLEY. Well, there are plenty, for I have looked over the list of pairs.

Mr. CURTIS. I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH], but I understand it was not intended to affect a quorum. If that be the construction of the pair—

Mr. SEERLEY. It is not a question of a quorum, but of demanding the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not say, of course. It is for the gentleman to determine that for himself.

Mr. CURTIS. I am paired for the rest of the day with the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the count by tellers, and the tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 128, noes 1. So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Maine to take a recess until 5 o'clock.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. The yeas and nays have been already ordered.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken by yeas and nays. The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 156, not voting 171, as follows:

YEAS—1.

Mr. BRANCH with Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. MOORE with Mr. HAUGEN.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I came into the Hall just as my name was called, but not in time to vote. I wish to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman comes within the rule if he was in the House during the call and failed to hear his name.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I heard my name called just as I entered, but did not have time to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request.

And then, on motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committees of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. COBB of Missouri, from the Committee on War Claims: A bill (S. 30) for the relief of St. Charles College. (Report No. 1181.)

By Mr. DOLLIVER, from the same committee: A bill (H. R. 2160) for the relief of R. A. Schellhaus. (Report No. 1182.)

asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAYERS, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. DINGLEY managers of the conference on the part of the House.

BRANCH BANK AT WORLD'S FAIR.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8001) to authorize a national bank at Chicago, Ill., to establish a branch office upon the grounds of the World's Columbian Exposition, to report it favorably, without amendment. As this is a House bill, there is some urgency in the matter, and as the Committee on Finance can see no objection to it, I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read.

Mr. PLATT. I thought, as I listened to the reading of the bill, that it provided that any bank might have this privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. Any bank designated by the Exposition. Only one bank can have the privilege, and it must be a bank in Chicago.

Mr. PLATT. Let the first part of the bill be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That any national bank located in the city of Chicago and State of Illinois which may be designated by the World's Columbian Exposition to conduct a banking office upon the exposition grounds is hereby authorized to open and conduct such office as a branch of the bank, subject to the same restrictions and having the same rights as the bank to which it belongs.

Mr. PLATT. It is all right.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2898) to authorize a national bank at Chicago, Ill., to establish a branch office upon the grounds of the World's Columbian Exposition, to report it adversely. Mr. SANDERS. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution, and that it be read three times and passed.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution which he has introduced.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. SAWYER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA RIVER BOAT RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the river and harbor bill. The amendment is the bill proposing to appropriate "the sum of $2,860,356.35, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in the construction of a boat railway, and of the necessary marine apparatus and appliances in connection therewith, for the purpose of transferring boats and their cargoes over and across the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls and Ten Mile Rapids on the Columbia River, either in the State of Oregon or the State of Washington, as may be determined most expedient by the Secretary of War."

This bill has heretofore been reported three several times from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, without any objection from any member of that committee, and it has also passed the Senate on three several occasions at as many different sessions. It seems that whenever this subject has been carefully investigated by any committee it has been the unanimous conclusion that it is a public improvement of the very greatest importance, and one that ought to be entered upon by the Government at the very earliest possible moment.

In view of the action that has been taken heretofore in reference to this measure, I desire to express the sincere hope that the Committee on Commerce may see its way clear to inaugurate this improvement, if not by the appropriation of the whole amount, of such amount as will enable the work to be commenced and prosecuted with vigor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed.

STATE TAXATION OF NATIONAL NOTES, ETC.

Mr. HARRIS. On the 2d of March Senate bill 1699 was adversely reported and indefinitely postponed. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which it was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered, and the bill placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the bill (S. 1699) to subject to State taxation national-bank notes and United States Treasury notes was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill with the adverse report be placed upon the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FINANCIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama on the subject of silver coinage now on the table be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Resolutions by Mr. MORGAN, directing the Committee on Finance to make examination and report to the Senate certain information in relation to currency and coinage.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the restoration of silver to the right of free coinage in the mints of the United States on an exact equality and the same terms and conditions with gold and its use as full legal-tender money by the Government and people of the United States is, and has been since 1877, demanded by a vast majority of the people of the United States in every form in which their desires and wishes can find expression. Bills for this purpose have repeatedly been passed through both Houses of Congress, against all the power of the executive branch of the Government exerted to suppress them; and the Executive veto, when all other methods of opposition and obstruction have failed, has been unhesitatingly interposed.

The Democratic party of this country is especially committed to the support of this great measure through the action of the State conventions in more than thirty of the States of the Union, containing nearly two-thirds of the entire population of the country, and by the votes and advocacy of from three-fourths to nine-tenths of the Democrats in the two Houses of Congress whenever, until this session of Congress, free-coinage bills have been before them. In addition, there has always been a considerable and respectable minority of the Republicans who have earnestly coöperated and voted with the Democrats in behalf of the measure. This great preponderance of public opinion, desire, and sentiment has up to this time been defeated and held in check by the combined money power of Europe and America, which finds in both countries the surest method of holding in servitude the masses of the people and appropriating the avails of their labor to be through a contraction of the volume of the circulating medium in which values must be measured.

Since 1873, when Mr. Ernest Seyd, a German-English banker and an alleged agent of foreign bankers and bondholders in aiding to effect the demonetization of silver, was in this country, and when Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, who had the bill for this purpose in charge in the House, said: "Ernest Seyd, of London, a distinguished writer and bullionist who has given great attention to the subject of mints and coinage, is now here, and after examining the first drafts of this bill made various sensible suggestions which the committee accepted and embodied in the bill," the efforts of that class, then so efficiently served in this country by Mr. Seyd, have been constant, unrelenting, and zealous in coöperation with the same class in the United States in resisting, obstructing, and up to this time defeating the remonetization and free coinage of silver so urgently demanded by the great body of the American people. The leading papers of this country for months past have teemed with all sorts of articles and arguments in opposition to free coinage.

Extracts from foreign papers against silver remonetization, evidently printed in Europe to influence public sentiment in this country, have been published and republished broadcast throughout the United States by our papers. The wires of all the telegraph lines have been burdened with every conceivable sort of literature, without reference to its truth or falsity, in the same interest. The mails have been loaded with printed and written matter of both foreign and domestic production in the same line of opposition to silver coinage. In short, Mr. President, we have in the last twelve months witnessed the most powerful, exhaustive, and vindictive assault, becoming more intense every day as this session of Congress has been approached, and made regardless of expense or truth by the concentrated capital of Europe and America on the free-coinage sentiment of our people.

The great mass of the plain people of this country, whose labor creates its wealth, whose valor sustains its flag, and whose patriotism preserves and perpetuates its institutions, dispersed in the pursuit of their avocations over a continent, without organization or concentration, either of which in the very nature of their surroundings seems impossible, are the victims of this unholy and wicked conspiracy to prevent the restoration of silver to its ancient full money power; because to do this would break the great gold monopoly, which gives to the comparatively insignificant number in possession of that metal absolute control on their own terms over all the products of labor. Our people vote right. They make good county and district and State platforms declaratory of their will, and elect State and Federal officials pledged to carry them out in administering their governments. They demand in every way they know how, and have done so for fifteen years, the free and unlimited coinage of silver; yet through parliamentary legerdemain, legislative hocus-pocus, and "ways that are dark and tricks that are (not) vain," they are defrauded of their rights, cheated out of the fruits of their victories at the polls, and left naked in the hands of their oppressors, until the time rolls around for another canvass and election, when the same performance has been repeated and the farce of "How not to do it" has been reenacted.

Mr. President, this thing has gone on until it has become decidedly monotonous. The people are not going to stand it always without calling to an account not only individual legislators, but the political party which, with a majority sent here charged with the duty of passing a free-coinage bill, lacks either the wit or the will to pass one. There are times when it is said "patience ceases to be a virtue," and that time may be unfortunately nearer at hand than some seem to suppose. Certain it is that for fifteen years the great majority of the people of this country, with the most zealous and strenuous efforts they could make for the passage of a free-coinage bill, have been repeatedly balked and defeated by a combination small in numbers but powerful in wealth and resources and influence.

The executive department of the Government, in all its branches, from Hayes's Administration to Harrison's, including Cleveland's, has been most thoroughly and completely under the control and influence and dictation of the great capitalistic combination which has just scored another victory against the people on the silver issue. All these administrations made bitter, savage war on silver, and left no means untried to discredit and break it down and debase it. Nobody knew how Mr. Cleveland stood on the silver question until after he was elected, and he commenced to war on it before his inauguration in a letter addressed to a committee of members of the House of Representatives (one hundred of them) who were deputed to confer with him on the subject.

All of these administrations, from the President down to the lowest reporting official of the Treasury Department, in messages and reports denounced silver coinage, urged its abandonment, denounced the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes as a debt of the Government which should be paid and the notes taken out of circulation, retired and cancelled, although not a cent of interest runs on them; advising the country that gold and national bank notes should be our only circulating medium, with subsidiary silver coin for purposes of change. This is the feast to which our people were invited in response to their oft-repeated demand for free silver coinage, for a perpetuation of the legal-tender note issue, and such other increase of circulation as could be made in view of the money famine under which they were suffering.

No bolder or more audacious defiance of the popular will has ever occurred in the history of any government, whether Republican or monarchical, than for nearly fifteen years has marked the course of the executive department of this Government in its dealings with the silver question. The power of the British-American syndicate of bankers and bondholders, which in 1873 accomplished the demonetization of silver, and since that time has fought its restoration with all its tremendous resources, has proved stronger than the people. Secure in the renomination of President Harrison by the Republican party, and of his hostility to the free coinage of silver, if he should perchance be re-elected, this combination is now giving its undivided attention to placing at the head of the Democratic ticket a name which, like that of President Harrison, is backed by a record which of itself is a guaranty that free silver coinage will be an impossibility if he should become President.

All the powers and resources of this great combination are being strained to their utmost tension for the accomplishment of this great purpose. Democrat, Mugwump, and Republican in this combination meet and cooperate with the utmost heartiness on common ground for the attainment of this end. It would seem that Republicans ought to be content with dictating the nomination of their own party; and when they insist on participating in the selection of a Democratic candidate that Democrats should remember that the rule is good in politics as in war, that what their adversaries desire them to do is exactly what they should not do.

With the moral force inherent in the Presidential office, the veto power and that which comes from executive patronage, all secured against free coinage of silver, whether the President to be elected in November next be Democrat or Republican, the work commenced in the demonetization of silver in 1873 will be secure at least for four years more from the 4th of March next. This accomplished, the victory of the banking and bondholding syndicate of Europe and America will have been won, and these underground workers and manipulators of our politics will be content, with their grip tightened on the throats of the agricultural people of the country, to rest from their political labors utterly indifferent as to whether a Democratic or Republican President is elected, to give to each party a liberal campaign fund, and to retire to Europe and enjoy their vacation. Those Democrats (and it is to be hoped there are but few) who propose to seek relief through the organization of a third party are pursuing an ignis fatuus.

I can imagine no worse or poorer disposition a Democrat can make of himself than to abandon his party to go into such an organization. There is no room and never has been room in this country for but two great political parties. All efforts (and there have been many) to organize third parties have been miserable failures. Whenever they have attempted to be anything more than mere political guerrillas, hanging on the flanks of the two great contending parties which have controlled this Government since its foundation, they have been crushed out of existence in the shock of battle between the two; not one has ever survived a brief and profitless and troubled existence; their membership has disbanded and been absorbed in one or both of the two great parties. There has not in the history of the country been but one solitary exception.

All have gone that way, leaving no monument in the institutions or policies of their time, and are remembered only as temporary and evanescent disturbers of normal political conditions. The Democrat who leaves his own to join a third party because silver has not been remonetized and financial stringency has not been relieved, neutralizes and destroys himself as a political factor; and, to the extent that his action can do it, weakens and breaks down the only party capable of resisting the Republican policy of perpetuating the single gold standard, destroying silver as money, and investing national banks with the power and privilege of furnishing the country with its paper currency subject to expansion or contraction at their will.

A Democrat who desires to accomplish these results by strengthening and building up the Republican party can not do so better than by making a political nonentity of himself in the so-called third party. The American farmer, of all the men in this country, has the most direct and vital interest in the free coinage of silver and the expansion of the volume of our circulating medium. They of all living men are the greatest sufferers from the Republican financial policy of contraction. Western and Southern Democratic representatives in the two Houses of Congress are now and have always been practically a unit in favor of the free coinage of silver. To give free coinage and full money power to silver means to double the metallic basis for paper and all credit money, to double the coin basis for all banking purposes, and make possible double our note and paper circulation, every dollar of it redeemable in coin at the will of the holder. It means to make silver float all paper and as much of it as gold floats, whether Treasury and bank notes, or checks, drafts, or promissory notes. It means a per capita circulation of money equal to all the requirements of this country, its business, and commerce. And these results mean a return of prosperity to the country, good prices for crops, good wages for labor, and a fair valuation for all the products of labor.

One hundred millions of dollars of gold are stored in the national Treasury as a redemption fund for $346,681,016 of legal-tender greenback notes, and has proved ample for the purpose. Speaking in round numbers, $1 in gold thus floats $3.50 of legal-tender paper money. On the 1st day of April there was in the Treasury $354,063,617 of standard silver dollars, standing as a redemption fund for $325,141,186 silver certificates in circulation, being more than $1 in silver for every dollar of outstanding paper. Every dollar of this silver is full legal tender. It will pay debts, buy property, and perform all the money functions performed by gold.

Silver certificates are preferred to gold coin because more convenient to carry and equally acceptable in business transactions; yet the policy of our Government, forced upon the country and maintained by the Republican party, makes the gold dollar float more than three and a half times as much paper as the silver dollar is permitted to float. When silver was demonetized in 1873 it outvalued gold 3 cents on the dollar—it took 103 cents of gold to buy 100 cents of silver. With free coinage we will have no more of the much derided "70-cent dollar." Silver bullion will become exclusively a money metal, will be no longer a mere commodity, and will go to the mints and be coined into legal-tender dollars. The gold monopoly will be broken.

Gold, now increased in value 33 per cent by legislation against silver, will by the undoing of that legislation fall, and for the same reason silver will rise, and the two metals will come together in substantial parity. These are the results which Western and Southern Democrats are endeavoring to achieve, and which will be imperilled to the extent they can do it by such Democrats as leave their ranks to go into a third party. If Western and Southern Democrats and the minority of the Republicans who are laboring with them for the accomplishment of these great ends, will stand firm and continue to wage an aggressive and energetic war on this line against the domination of the British-American syndicate which through the power of money and overshadowing wealth is aiming for their own aggrandizement to reduce our agricultural people to the level of European serfs, victory will crown their efforts.

Pertinacity, constancy, and courage are always necessary to the accomplishment of great reforms. Faint-heartedness, indecision, factional divisions, and impatience never yet won a victory; while determined purpose and unity of action in pursuit of the right never fails. Our achievements since 1878 give assurance of ultimate success. Over the most determined resistance of the executive branch of the Government, and in spite of the utmost efforts to prevent it of the same class of people who are opposing us now, we arrested the cancellation, retirement, and destruction of the greenback notes and saved to the country $346,681,016 of that currency, which is admitted to be the best paper money in the world.

We have now in the Treasury and in circulation or represented by silver certificates $412,535,360 of coined standard silver dollars, issued under the Bland act of 1878 and the act of 1890, with a monthly addition under the latter act of 4,500,000 ounces of silver of the coinage value of nearly $6,000,000, represented by Treasury notes which go into circulation. The greenback notes and the silver thus saved to the circulation of this country, together constitute a full half of all the money in circulation on the first day of this month (April), as shown by the Treasury report of that date. The Bland act of 1878 was passed over the President's veto, and the act of 1890 was thrown as a tub to the whale by the opponents of free coinage in order to appease popular clamor when hotly pressed by the advocates of that measure. They would gladly have escaped without making any concession at all.

With a President friendly to free silver coinage, or, if not friendly, who would not have used the power of that great office to suppress and defeat the will of the people, there has not been a session of Congress since 1877 which would not promptly have passed a free-coinage bill. The Western and Southern Democrats, with a patriotic band of Republicans (the same who saved the South from the odious and infamous force bill), have moved and engineered this progress toward the restoration of silver and the expansion of the volume of our circulation. No other or greater difficulties or obstructions can confront us in the future in advancing on the same line than have been overcome in the past in securing what we now have.

What must the people of the South and West do? Must they sit supinely and see all the products of agriculture falling every day when they are already below the cost of production, without making some effort to save themselves from ruin and bankruptcy? In 1872 cotton was worth 19 cents; to-day it is worth only 6 cents. Wheat was worth $1.47 per bushel; to-day it is worth 85 cents, notwithstanding crop failures throughout Europe and famine in Russia. Corn was worth 70 cents per bushel, and to-day is worth 41 cents; these great staples having fallen regularly with silver since its demonetization in 1873.

I read here a short table prepared from official statistics of foreign commerce for 1891, and the report of the Director of the Mint for 1890 on Production of Metals, by Hon. JO ABBOTT, of Texas, and used by him in an able speech on the silver question delivered in the House a few weeks ago, which shows beyond doubt or controversy the relation between the fall of silver and the fall in the prices of our great agricultural staples, and will add that I have verified the figures and find them absolutely correct:

*The coining value of an ounce of pure silver is $1.29.

There is no controverting figures like these. Since 1873 the circulating money of this country has been based on the single gold standard, while prior to that time it was based on both gold and silver, these two money metals being practically equal in volume. All paper money, notes, checks, drafts, bills of exchange, in a word all forms of paper representing credit, having been ultimately redeemable in gold and silver, and the values of all property, labor, and the products of labor having been measured by the combined volume of the two metals and the paper and credit superstructure they would maintain; when silver (constituting one half of the metallic basis on which this great paper and credit system was built) was demonetized and the whole system was left standing on gold alone, the paper money and all the forms of paper representing credit, the values of all property, of labor and the products of labor, naturally and necessarily had to undergo a process of contraction in order to be adjusted to the new and narrower basis of credit and the new and shrunken measure of value.

Silver deprived of money functions and debased to a mere commodity, fell in value, and with it went down all other commodities, while gold went rapidly up, so that 66 cents of gold will now buy as much of anything, especially of agricultural products, as 100 cents of that metal would have bought before silver was demonetized. The holders of gold and bonds, whether national, State, railroad, or municipal, and those having fixed incomes, thus reaped enormous profits in the increased value conferred on gold; while debtors who had to pay in gold, and owners of all other property values, were correspondingly oppressed. This is the work of the European bond and gold holders and bankers, aided by their American allies, who prate and talk and bellow in chorus about the dishonest silver dollar, about inflation and repudiation, and characterize as revolutionary and communistic the honest efforts of the people to undo, as far as it now can be done, the robbery which has been perpetrated on them.

I read here from the Economic Crisis, an able work on economic subjects, by Mr. Morton Frewen, of London. He says:

It may indeed be affirmed without fear of contradiction, the legislation arranged in the interest of a certain class, first by Lord Liverpool in this country, and again by Sir Robert Peel at the instigation of Mr. Jones Loyd and other wealthy bankers, which was supplemented recently by simultaneous antisilver legislation in Berlin and Washington at the instance of the great financial houses. This legislation has about doubled the burden of all national debts by an artificial enhancement of the value of money.

The fall of all prices induced by this cause has been on such a scale that while in twenty years the national debt of the United States quoted in dollars has been reduced by nearly two-thirds, yet the value of the remaining one-third, measured in wheat, in bar iron, or bales of cotton, is considerably greater; is a greater demand draft on the labor and industry of the nation than was the whole debt at the time it was contracted.

The aggravation of the burdens of taxation induced by this so-called "appreciation of gold," which is no natural appreciation, but has been brought about by class legislation to increase the value of gold which is in few hands, requires but to be explained to an enfranchised Democracy, which will know how to protect itself against further attempts to contract the currency and to force down prices to the confusion of every existing contract.

Of all classes of middlemen, bankers have been by far the most successful in intercepting and appropriating an undue share of produced wealth. While the modern system of banking and credit may be said to be even yet in its infancy, that portion of the assets of the community which is to-day in the strong boxes of the bankers would, if declared, be an astounding revelation of the recent profits of this particular business; and not only has the business itself become a most profitable monopoly, but its interests in a very few hands are diametrically opposed to the interests of the majority. By legislation intended to contract the currency and force down all prices, including wages, the price paid for labor, the money owner has been able to increase the purchase power of his sovereign or dollar by the direct diminution of the price of every kind of property measured in money.

For twelve years the prophecies of the authors of silver demonetization, that ruin and disaster would follow a renewal of silver coinage, prophecies reiterated time and again by our Presidents, their Cabinet officers, and especially the Secretaries and other officials of the Treasury Department, have been falsified and disproved; yet these same people continue to croak them in as dismal a key as ever. They predicted that $50,000,000 was all the country would absorb, and we have now $412,535,360, either in certificates or actual silver coin in circulation. Silver, they said, would drive gold from the country, and we have by official estimate $500,000,000 more gold in the country than we had when coinage of our silver dollars commenced in 1878.

If any other experience is needed, France with her $700,000,000 of silver and $900,000,000 of gold, the two interchangeable and circulating without friction at parity, presents a conclusive refutation of the argument that free coinage would drive gold out of the country or raise it to a premium. And it will be remembered that the relation of silver to gold coin in France is that 154 of the former to 1 of the latter, while in this country it is 16 to 1—a difference of 3 cents more silver in our dollar than that of France. The nations of the earth which use concurrently gold and silver money, according to Mr. Edward Atkinson's report to the State Department in 1887, had in circulation in 1885 $2,463,002,000 of gold, and by the side of and at parity with it, $1,738,114,000 of silver. British India and the Asiatic countries using silver alone are not included in the estimate.

In these facts is found a complete answer to the argument that with free coinage our country would become the "dumping ground" for all the silver in the world. The ratio between silver and gold in France is the same as throughout Europe, and the silver coin throughout Europe passes interchangeably and at par with gold. European silver coin could not be brought to this country except at a heavy per cent of loss in addition to the 3 per cent discount it would meet here in competition with our own silver coin. Why bring it here to be discounted when it is as good as gold at home in Europe and doing duty and needed there as money?

The alleged overproduction of silver is purely imaginary. The silver production of the world is estimated to be annually from $135,000,000 to $150,000,000, and of gold from $90,000,000 to $110,000,000. The Director of the Mint estimates that $18,105,901 of gold and $9,231,173 of silver, went into the industrial arts in the United States alone during the year 1890, and reports that the amount of these metals going into the arts is increasing rapidly every year. According to this statement, the aggregate of gold and silver going into the arts annually and increasing each year is $27,337,079 in this country.

I have no estimate as to the consumption of these metals in the balance of the world in the industrial arts, but of course it must be very much greater in the aggregate, possibly many times as much as that used in our country. Some idea may be found from these facts of the annual addition to the world's stock of money after the demand of the industrial arts for gold and silver has been supplied. It was estimated in 1886 by the Director of the Mint that $46,000,000 of gold were consumed in the arts, leaving only fifty or sixty millions for money purposes to meet the increasing annual demands of the business of the world. And it may be added that by common consent and admission the gold production of the world is now and has been diminishing for some time.

Secretary Windom, in his report to the Fifty-first Congress, stated that there is no known accumulation of silver bullion anywhere in the world, and that all the silver coin in Europe is needed and employed there for money purposes. Our own country produces more than 40 per cent of all the silver mined in the world. This great product has been deliberately sacrificed, and the interest of the mass of our people, in opposition to their repeated and almost earnest protest, subordinated to a European policy, which was adopted for the purpose of maintaining there an aristocracy in the power to hold in subjection the common people through the influence of wealth in the hands of a few. Republican France, of all the European powers, stands most firmly by silver, and gives the most splendid illustration of its virtues as the money of the common people.

Like the other arguments against free coinage, the charge of overproduction falls to the ground when confronted with the facts of silver production and consumption in the world, the necessity for it in view of the dwindling and decreasing production of gold, and the increasing necessity of the world for money. Instead of the ruin and disaster so confidently predicted as a consequence of the partial coinage of silver we now have, only the most beneficent results have followed; and it is frankly and freely admitted by some of the ablest opponents of silver coinage in the United States that our silver saved us in the recent perilous crisis from which we are just emerging, arising from scarcity of gold and an enforced contraction of the volume of money.

When gold left the country silver remained with us. And it is always true when we have both metals in circulation that one of them always remains; both never leave. When one flows out the other comes in to take its place and fill the vacuum. The two metals are the complement of each other. Neither performs its proper functions except when the other is also ready to perform its part. Either one of these metals enthroned alone as money becomes a despot—an instrument of monopoly. The other is needed to hold it in check and reduce what otherwise would be a destructive power to a condition of conservative beneficence.

These two metals during all the ages have been joined together in the service of civilization, commerce, and progress, and have never been divorced, except when greed for gain and lust for power by the few over the great mass of the people has prompted it. The production of these metals from the earliest times of which we have records has been varying, silver sometimes predominating and at other periods gold. Tables of the Director of the United States Mint show that from 1801 to 1820 the average yearly yield was 4 of silver to 1 of gold; from 1821 to 1840 the average annual yield was 2 of silver to 1 of gold; from 1841 to 1860 the annual average was 2½ of gold to 1 of silver; from 1861 to 1880 the average was nearly 2 of gold to 1 of silver; from 1881 to 1889 the average was one-sixth more of silver than of gold.

The most remarkable fact in the history of these metals is that an excessive production of either one of them has, in due time, invariably been corrected by an enlarged production of the other, so that, as stated in the speech of Senator JONES of Nevada, delivered in this body May 12, 1890, "the stock of both existing in the world (the product of all time) is estimated to be about equal, the production of the past five hundred years being set down as—gold, $7,240,000,000; silver, $7,455,000,000." If we accept the experience of the world from the beginning of time as the test of truth on this subject, we need not fear for the maintenance of the desired equality in the production of the two precious metals.

England found her great opportunity, and with the sagacious and far-reaching statesmanship for which her rulers are more distinguished than those of any other country on earth, seized and improved it, in the great crime of silver demonetization by the United States, the leading silver-producing country in the world. Her great dependency, British India, containing more than one-seventh of the entire population of the globe, of which by the recent census more than 40 per cent are engaged in agriculture, uses silver almost exclusively. Silver is the sole metallic money of India, and is unaffected in value by the fluctuations of the prices elsewhere of silver bullion; and it is the current money, at its face value, in all business and commerce throughout that great and enormously populated empire.

British India produces largely both cotton and wheat. The cost of labor wages is lower in India than in any other country of the world, amounting to only a few cents per day, so that the two great staples named are produced at much smaller cost than in any other country. London is the great silver market of the world, as it is the world's market for wheat and as Liverpool is for cotton. Our own Government makes its monthly purchases of silver under the act of 1890, as it did those under the Bland act of 1878 until its repeal, by London quotations.

Silver, debased and cheapened by American legislation, flowing into the great London market, where it is the policy of the English Government to depress its price to the lowest possible point for the benefit of India, whither it goes and is absorbed in that great population within a small fraction of being four times as numerous as that of the United States, has given tremendous development to the production of wheat and cotton and the manufacture of the latter, indeed to all the business and commerce of India. The Suez Canal, shortening and cheapening the export route to the markets of the world, has also been a factor of importance in this advancement and progress of India.

Our great war tariff, superseded in 1890 by the still greater and almost prohibitory McKinley tariff law, being regarded as a declaration of commercial war against all the nations of the earth, they have banded against us and in a spirit of retaliation have for twenty years been striving in every possible way to render themselves independent of us. Of our exports to foreign markets 76 per cent are agricultural products, and it is upon these, that this war of retaliation has been made with most crushing effect. Our cotton, wheat, corn, beef, pork, and all other products of the farm, are now met in the markets of the world with similar products from other countries raised by the cheapest labor in the world, with which they must compete, because the nations of the world have been compelled to foster these productions in other countries which will exchange and trade products with them rather than with the United States, which, by a prohibitory tariff, excludes foreign goods from our markets.

Thus our farmers, while being robbed in all they buy at home, at the same time are having the foreign market for their surplus well nigh destroyed by the tariff. Hear the advice given the wheat-raisers of the Northwest by the Finance Committee of the United States Senate. I read from Part 1, Tariff Testimony Finance Committee, United States Senate, page 21, as follows:

The competition in wheat-growing which has been developed in India, South America, Australia, and in the British Possessions in North America is likely to make unprofitable the production of this cereal for exportation by our people, and to cause the wheat-grower of the Northwest to look to an enlargement of the certain and remunerative home market. This enlarged and profitable market can only be secured by increasing the number of people engaged in other than agricultural pursuits, and by furnishing to all increased employment without diminution of wages. To cripple our manufacturing interests and reduce the purchasing power of our workmen will result in augmenting the number of competitors in the field of agricultural production, and the increased supply could, in that event, only find a market in Europe by enforced competition with India at ruinous prices. Wheat can now be laid down in Liverpool from the central provinces of India at as low a cost for transportation as from Chicago, and Indian wheat can be delivered in New York at less cost for transportation than from the wheat fields of Dakota.

It is for the highest interest of the American farmer that the number of our food consumers rather than of food producers should be increased, and that the general prosperity of all should be secured. It is true that the decline in prices of agricultural products has been very great, but the value of these when measured by the value of clothing, farming utensils, or other necessities of a farmer's life, is much greater now than in any of the years preceding 1890.

Our tariff legislation furnished the incentive, indeed the compulsion, for the great development of wheat-growing in the countries named, and the demonetization of silver under the inspiration and manipulation of the British-American combination of bond and gold owners, furnished to India and South America, which use only silver money, cheap silver to infuse life and energy and enterprise into the business and agriculture of those countries by giving them an abundant money circulation. Wheat, says this committee, can be laid down in Liverpool from India at as low a cost of transportation as from Chicago, and can be delivered in New York from the same country at a less cost of transportation than from the wheat fields of Dakota.

Wheat is raised in India with labor costing only 7 or 8 cents per day; and if the cost of transportation is no greater from India to Liverpool than from Chicago to that point, and is less from India to New York than it is from Dakota to New York, it is very plain that the Finance Committee, if correct, has shown that we have not only lost our great foreign market for wheat, but are in danger of having our home market invaded; for we all know that our wheat-growers have to pay many times 7 cents per day for the labor which produces it. Cotton stands on precisely the same footing with wheat in respect to its production in and transportation from India and South America. That wheat is not so low as cotton in proportion is due entirely to the accident of short crops throughout Europe and famine in Russia, which usually is the source of large wheat supplies for Europe.

Before the demonetization of silver the wheat and cotton growers of the United States met no competition in European markets with India. India had never exported one bushel of wheat to England prior to 1874. The United States was at that time exporting to England 150,000,000 bushels yearly, and receiving for it usually $1.20 per bushel. In 1889 the wheat exports of the United States to England had fallen to about 45,000,000 bushels, and the price to 90 cents, while those of India had risen from less than 200,000 bushels in 1874 to 50,000,000 bushels.

An authority now before me states that while it had taken England fifteen years to increase her spindles from 150,000,000 to 250,000,000, India, with the aid of cheap American silver, has added 100,000,000 spindles in ten years. This of course was to spin India cotton, to the displacement of the same amount of American cotton. Sir R. N. Fowler is represented by the same authority to have said in a speech before the Colonial Board of Trade in London, in speaking of the British India silver policy:

If we continue this policy a few years longer we can ruin the wheat and cotton industry of the United States and build up India as the chief exporter of these staples.

Cheap breadstuffs and cheap cotton is what England above all else desires. Our farmers and planters have heretofore furnished English markets with these indispensable products; but our own Government has in its antisilver policy surrendered our high vantage ground to England and enabled her to hand over to her great dependency, British India, the export market for cotton and wheat, which under all the laws of trade, should have remained ours.

Mr. President, British India pays annually to the British Government a little more than $72,000,000 on account of the expenses of the British Government in India. This is a debt which must be paid in gold or its equivalent in silver. It is always paid in silver, and is increased from 30 to 40 per cent by reason of the discount on silver when valued in gold; making the debt, when liquidated, amount to the neighborhood of 105,000,000 silver dollars. The greater the discount on silver, the larger the amount paid to the British Government every year in liquidation of it.

British merchants every week and month make payments of millions of dollars in India for purchases there, all in silver, and the cheapest silver brings to them, as it does to the British Government, the largest profits. British interests, which control the great London silver market, and the commerce as well as all the silver-using countries of the world, all find their most lucrative business with India in the cheapest silver; because when sent to that country and coined the money is of full face or coinage value and is the current money of the country. Besides, to cheapen silver cripples the productive power of the United States, the great rival of England, while building up and increasing the capacity of British India for the production of cotton and wheat for English consumption.

England will never surrender her power or her advantages in respect to this silver question voluntarily or unless forced to do it. She refuses now and has always refused to treat with other powers for a basis for bimetallic coinage. She knows her advantages and proposes to hold them. The other powers of Europe decline peremptorily all propositions looking to an international agreement for bimetallic coinage unless England joins, which it is admitted on all sides she will not do. So, Mr. President, the man who tells the country he favors free coinage of silver under an international agreement simply adopts a circuitous method of declaring that he favors the single gold standard and is opposed to silver coinage, because he knows that an international agreement is an impossibility.

Confined to the narrow and, as we have seen, diminishing margin of gold for the measurement of values since the destruction of silver money in 1873, the fall of prices which then commenced has been going on ever since, and continues yet day after day, and month after month. In many sections of the country, desperate efforts have been made to arrest this fall by means of "booms," which have always ultimately reacted with the most destructive effect. Our only hope of extrication from this condition (and nobody has proposed any other) is to reform the tariff, reduce it to a strictly revenue basis, and establish the freest trade possible between our country and the other nations of the earth, consistent with the collection of a sufficient revenue for the support of the Government; and to retrace our steps on the silver question, undo as far as can now be done the crime of its demonetization, and restore silver to free coinage and full money power, making it the equal before the law in all respects with gold.

These two great policies go hand in hand, are inseparably connected and bound together, and the success of both is indispensable to the national prosperity. We can expect no aid from Europe in restoring silver except from republican France. Aristocratic and kingly power, with the aid of its American dupes and allies, decreed for its own aggrandisement the destruction of silver money both in Europe and America, and will never voluntarily surrender what it has gained. The United States, when not half the power among the nations of the earth they now are, struck the blow which demonetized silver, and, if silver is to be restored, must lead the way with a bold and aggressive free-silver policy. This will accomplish what we desire, and nothing else will. If this Government will adopt free coinage, and boldly and honestly enforce it, Europe instead of ourselves will be begging for an international bimetallic agreement.

The solicitude of European gold and bond owners and brokers, which prompted them to send Mr. Seyd over here to aid in procuring the demonetization of silver when our unsuspecting people knew nothing about what was going on, and the fight they and their capitalistic brethren on this side of the ocean have been making ever since to retain the power then obtained, is conclusive proof of their opinion that this Government can control the silver question. No man has ever doubted this who is not an advocate of the single gold standard per se, and opposed on any terms to silver coinage. The power of this Government is fully equal to the greatest requirements of the occasion, and the highest and best interests of the people demand that it be exerted. Let our people be but true to themselves, continue without ceasing the agitation of this question, and exact the most rigid responsibility from all their representatives, State and national, for their action on this subject, and success is assured.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, there are rocks ahead. We are drifting upon them. Presently the ship of state will strike them. No master of finance appears to save ship, crew, or cargo. Gold is the cry; gold, gold, gold, nothing but gold, although this is the greatest silver-producing nation in the world, and although if we had financiers equal to our opportunities we might dominate the financial markets of the world. The silver men alone seem to have any appreciation or even recognition of our situation.

WHAT REMEDY IF NOT FREE-SILVER COINAGE IS PROPOSED?

They offer the only remedy that is offered to rescue us from financial depression and threatened financial ruin. If you do not like their remedy, the first step in which is the free coinage of silver, what do you propose?

Their agitation of the silver question has so far been of incalculable benefit to the country.

As a matter of education it has taught the people that the least reliable of all their teachers are those professional financiers who, having succeeded in the art of money-getting, have imagined themselves wise in monetary science. Their discredited prophecies bestrew the history of twenty years as the bones of the camel bestrew the pathway of a caravansary through the desert. It has taught the people also that the political leaders who have depreciated our power to sustain an increasing volume of silver money at par with gold little apprehend the needs and capacities of this nation, with its abounding energies and its vast progressive movements.

SILVER HAS SAVED US FROM PANIC.

But more than this, the work of the silver men has saved us from impending panic and bankruptcy. When the South American troubles came in 1890, and the great financial houses of England trembled to their foundations; when American securities held in England and on the continent of Europe were thrown suddenly upon the market, and the gold derived from their sale here was hurried abroad to prop the shaking fortunes of foreign magnates, it was our silver that preserved us from bankruptcy and ruin. Halfway and halting friend of silver as is our present Executive, he has made his acknowledgments to its beneficent service in a message to Congress, and bold implacable enemy of silver as was his competitor for the Presidential chair, the course of events has extorted even from him the concession that he was mistaken in his vaticinations against it.

THE COUNTRY UNDULY ALARMED RESPECTING SILVER.

The truth is that the country has been unduly and unwisely alarmed and disturbed respecting the issues involved in free silver coinage. With the report of Secretary Windom in 1889 that "there is no known accumulated stock of silver in the world," that "Germany has long since disposed of her stock of minted silver coins by recoinage into her own subsidiary coins and by use in coining for Egypt," and with his positive declaration "that it is plain that there is no danger that the silver product of past years will be poured into our mints"—with this knowledge imprinted to the country all apprehensions of silver avalanches, deluges, freshets, and the like should long since have vanished.

I have expressed the opinion elsewhere, and I here repeat it, that "the free coinage of silver would disappoint a majority of its advocates and opponents." Those who expect from the mere enfranchisement of silver a great abundance of money would not realize their hopes, and those who apprehend that it would dislocate our finances and wither enterprise would be appeased in their fears.

FREE-SILVER COINAGE NECESSARY TO ENLARGE AND FIX OUR METAL BASE OF CREDIT.

The importance of the silver question does not lie in the supposititious fact that it would vastly enhance the volume of our metal circulation. Such is not the case.

If we may believe the financial experts, the officers of our own Government who have wandered over the world in gathering facts from which they make deductions, it would enhance that volume in some degree; it would stimulate enterprise in some degree, as increasing currency always does; it would enhance the prices of products in some degree, and the prices of labor; it would facilitate debt and tax payment; it would operate as a hearty meal operates upon a hungry man. But its chief importance lies in the fact that free coinage of silver is necessary to enlarge and fix the metal base of our currency and credit system. It is estimated that a small percentage of business, some say 3 or 5 per cent, is done on cash payments. The rest is credit.

Behind this credit is currency which must be used in liquidation, and behind all our volume of currency, which is itself for the most part Government credit, is the metal money held for its redemption. That metal money of redemption is claimed to be gold only. Now, the gold base of this vast superstructure of currency and bond credit, Government credit and individual credit, is too narrow to sustain it, too narrow to admit of the increase in size and weight of the superstructure. If we continue to build up business on this narrow gold foundation, we will build to our ruin. The foundation will soon crumble under the overwhelming burden imposed upon it, and when the fall of the superstructure comes, as come it must, great will be the fall thereof. To-day we are piling up wrath against the day of wrath. We are sowing the wind, and the whirlwind will be the harvest.

GOLD AS SOLE STANDARD OVERBURDENED.

Look at our currency. It is reported to be as follows:

Gold and gold certificates.....	$784,567,309
Silver	967,832,530
Treasury notes of 1890.....	89,602,198

United States notes	$346,681,016
National-bank notes	172,529,451
Currency certificates of 1892	31,220,000

If gold only is used as money of redemption here we have $1 in gold only wherewithal to redeem over $3 in silver, in Treasury notes and in national-bank notes. If there were no other debts for gold to pay these would suffice to employ all we have. But we have behind these currencies, which it is maintained must be redeemable in gold, a national debt of a billion and a half of dollars; we have behind it also State debts, county debts, city debts, debts of railway corporations, and of a myriad of corporations and individuals, which are beyond the power of calculation.

If all this immensity of credit rests only on the gold-dollar standard an inverted pyramid is the only physical figure that can typify our situation. And when the pyramid is standing on its apex a very slight jostling of its balance may tumble it over.

CONTRACTED AND CHEAP CURRENCY PARADOXICAL.

Mr. President, I do not propose to-day to go into any general and enlarged discussion of the silver question. I propose to meet but one of the objections of the many sophistries which are urged against it, and to speak of it with reference to the allegation that the free coinage of silver would drive gold to a premium.

It is a common saying amongst those who advocate the single gold standard that the free coinage of silver would instantly put gold to a premium. They maintain also that when this is done, the currency will be contracted by the abstraction of the entire volume of gold from circulation, and at the same time maintain that we shall have a cheap silver dollar.

I will not pause to do more than notice a fallacy and a sophistry which are so palpable upon their face. It is impossible to have a contracted currency in which the demand for money will surpass the supply, and at the same time a cheap currency.

WHAT IS MEANT BY GOLD GOING TO A PREMIUM?

But I propose now to analyze this assertion that the free coinage of silver will drive gold to a premium. What do these prophets mean when they make this assertion? They may mean one of four things. Which one do they mean? If they mean that gold bullion would be driven to a premium over silver bullion, we answer that the gold bullion that forms the physical structure of a dollar is and has been at a premium over the silver bullion that forms a silver dollar for well nigh twenty years—that is, ever since the free coinage of silver bullion into dollars was discontinued in 1873.

THE DEGRADATION BY LAW AND THE DEPRECIATION OF VALUE OF SILVER BULLION CONTEMPORANEOUS.

The instant that the United States was known to have discontinued free-silver coinage gold bullion went to a premium over silver bullion. In short, the degradation of the silver metal by law, and its depreciation in value were contemporaneous. It is evident, too, that it was not a mere coincidence. It was the natural and inevitable operation of cause and effect. Silver bullion went down because struck down by law, and gold bullion stayed up because kept up by law. Thus, then, the truth is made patent to him that hath eyes to see that it was not by virtue of the free coinage of the two metals that they were parted in value, but by the discontinuance of free coinage as to silver, and the continuance of free coinage as to gold.

We can only argue and prophesy as to the unknown by taking our projections from the known.

We know that as long as there was free coinage of both gold and silver at their legal ratio of 15.98 of silver to 1 of gold, gold bullion did not go to a premium.

We know that when free coinage of silver was discontinued, while free coinage of gold remained, the favored gold bullion was instantly appreciated with relation to the disfavored silver bullion.

What more logical and natural, what more consistent with common sense than to believe that if you restore conditions that kept silver bullion equal in value to gold bullion, you will restore that equality? If experience be a lamp to guide our footsteps, this is the pathway that its light shines on.

GOLD BULLION CAN NOT GO TO PREMIUM OVER GOLD DOLLARS.

1. Do these prophets mean that gold bullion would go to a premium over the gold dollar? This they can hardly mean.

The gold dollar consists of so many grains of fine gold, and so much of alloy. The gold bullion would not go to a premium over the gold dollar. As there is nothing in it that is not in the gold dollar, of course it would not go to a premium over it.

2. Do the prophets mean that the gold bullion that composes a gold dollar would go to a premium over the silver dollar; or that the gold dollar would be worth more than a silver dollar? We put this inquiry in double form, because gold bullion and the dollar made out of it are under the law the same thing in value, as the law turns the gold bullion into the gold dollar without cost by free coinage.

WHAT IF GOLD DOLLARS GO TO PREMIUM OVER SILVER DOLLARS?

This is doubtless what the prophets mean, to wit, that the gold dollar will cost in silver to him that seeks it a silver dollar and a premium thereon. And we answer:

First. It is by no means certain that gold dollars would be made to cost a premium in silver dollars if silver bullion were freely coined like gold bullion.

Second. That if a gold dollar did cost more than 100 cents in silver dollars it would cost less in the products of labor to get the gold dollar and pay the premium for it than it costs now to get the gold dollar or a silver dollar.

Third. That the premium on the gold dollar if created by free coinage of silver would be but a transient incident of change.

Fourth. That the two dollars, that of gold and that of silver, would soon settle down to parity.

Fifth. That the transient disturbance would be less hurtful than the permanent disturbance and depression to which non-action subjects our finances and our industrial interests.

WHY SHOULD A GOLD DOLLAR COST OVER 100 CENTS IN SILVER DOLLARS?

Why should a gold dollar cost more than 100 cents in silver dollars if the silver dollars were freely coined? Gold dollars and silver dollars are now at par. You can buy as much of any commodity now with the one as the other, pay as much taxes with the one as the other, buy as much gold bullion or silver bullion with the one as the other, buy as much foreign exchange on London, Paris, or Berlin with the one as the other, travel to Europe as cheaply with the one as the other.

If the silver dollar equals the gold dollar in purchasing power and taxpaying power and debt-paying power, while the right to free coinage is denied it, how is it that they would not equal each other when free-coinage right is given it?

HOW THE LAW FAVORS GOLD AND DEGRADES SILVER IN THE MELTING POT

Take your two dollars, the one of gold, and the one of silver now, and as long as they remain dollars with the mint stamp upon them and the law of legal tender behind them, and they are matches in value just as a pound of lead and a pound of feathers are matches in weight, just as a yard of calico and a yard of silk are matches in length, just as a gallon of milk and a gallon of water are matches in quantity.

But beat the gold dollar with a hammer into a shapeless mass, or melt it in a pot, and the mint will turn it back into a brand new gold dollar for you, without cost to you, but at my cost, and your cost, and the cost of all the people of the country alike.

Beat up or melt down the silver dollar into a shapeless mass. Why should not the Government restore it, just as it will restore the gold dollar? Why will it not give you a brand new silver dollar as it gives the gold owner a brand new gold dollar? And if it did treat the silver dollar like the gold dollar, would it not plainly enhance the value of the silver dollar instead of enhancing the value of the gold dollar? As the law now stands, giving gold only the right of free coinage, it insures the value of it against all accidents. Let the merchant's pot of gold be reduced by fire, let a railroad accident crush it in transportation into a lump, the law puts it back into dollars for him. But let the old lady's stocking of silver dollars, let the silver dollars in the workman's wallet be mutilated, crushed, or melted, and no more dollars are connected for her or him out of the silver bullion; and away it goes to the junkshop.

EQUALITY OF FUNCTION MAKES EQUALITY OF VALUE.

Equality of right, equality of privilege, equality of function is what creates equality of value.

It is absurd to say that by giving privilege to the silver you will detract from the value of the silver dollar, and equally absurd to say that you will add value to the gold dollar. And if you do not add to the value of the gold dollar, what is going to make it bring a premium?

Demand and supply are the regulators of value. As matters stand now, only so many gold and so many silver dollars meet the demand for coined money. Add to the number of silver dollars, and the supply of coined dollars will be increased, while the demand will not be increased. As the demand for coined dollars will not be as great in proportion to the supply, it is fallacious to suppose that the value of any dollar will be increased by the free coinage of silver.

HOW THE LAW INSURES GOLD VALUE AND REPUTATES SILVER VALUE.

Now, Mr. President, let me put a supposititious story. Two gentlemen, we will say, the other day started from the city of Washington to Baltimore. The one of them carried in a bag a thousand gold dollars of the United States, and the other one carried in a bag a thousand silver dollars of the United States. They were equally rich, for the silver dollars, whether in Baltimore or in Washington, or anywhere in the United States, would answer every efficient purpose of commerce and business as the corresponding number of dollars in the other bag. Midway between here and the city of Baltimore the train ran off the track. The wheels of a car passed over the silver bag and mutilated and crushed into a shapeless lump the silver dollars; and the wheels of another car went over the other bag and mutilated and crushed into a shapeless mass the gold dollars. Then the train took fire, and the fire swept over the bullion as it lay in the wreck.

The men picked themselves up, and they were unhurt. The one went to his lump of gold and the other picked up his lump of silver. What had happened to them? Why, that lump of gold was just as valuable to the man who owned it as it was before, because at the expense of the whole people of the United States who pay the premium of insurance he had bullion there which was guaranteed to him to be turned into dollars at their cost. He picked up the pile of shapeless metal and he went to the Treasury, which is the insurance office, and he got back his gold dollars and went on his way rejoicing. Nothing more had happened to the gold man than had happened to the silver man, but when the silver man who had suffered this accident went to the same insurance office to have his silver dollars restored to him by the Mint, what did this great Government say to him? It said to him, if it spoke the truth, "I am a cheat and a fraud; I have swindled you out of $300, because I refuse as to you to turn that bullion which you had to take under my stamp back into silver money; while at the same time I have guaranteed the gold and turned it back into dollars for another."

So, Mr. President, when we hear so much about good faith from the hands of our lawmakers here, let them pause and reflect that they stand before the country as repudiators of their own silver circulation and refuse to make it good against the accidents of chance or against the act of God which no man can control.

Sir, if the lightning were to shoot forth from the heavens and strike the pile of silver dollars without any man's default, and strike the pile of gold dollars without any man's default, the Government of the United States guarantees to the gold man that it will remedy the act of God, and restore to him his property in money shape, while it repudiates the holder of the silver dollar, and says "I will not turn your silver back into dollars, you may go and roam about the markets to find a purchaser for it if you will; we have all we want, and will not take it at any price."

NOMINAL PREMIUM ON GOLD DOES NOT MEAN COSTLIER GOLD TO PRODUCER OR LABORER.

Now, Mr. President, to go along a little further with an analysis of this proposition, if a gold dollar were to cost for a time more than 100 cents in silver it would not mean that it would be costlier to get the gold dollar to the wheat, corn, cattle, or other commodity owner, or to the laborer in the workshop or the field. The prices of the commodities being enhanced by an increased volume of money, the silver dollars gotten for them would answer all the ordinary uses of the commodity seller, and the laborer would pay his debts and taxes, would settle his store accounts, would clothe and school his children, would carry himself upon a railroad train, and subserve all his general purposes. And if for some extraordinary use he needed a gold dollar it would be easier for him to pay for it over a dollar in silver with the enhanced price for his products and labor than it is now in the depressed condition of prices to get the silver dollar.

DISTURBANCE WOULD BE TRANSIENT, IF AT ALL OCCURRING.

If the gold dollar were transiently put to a premium over the silver dollar it would be only the spasmodic change of the market due to the transient uneasiness produced by the prophets of evil. All changes, all reforms, all movements of progress are attended with some inconveniences. If a man moves his household goods out of a cabin into a palace, some of his Chinaware will be broken in the wagon that moves it, and some of his chairs and bedsteads may lose a leg here and there, or get the varnish rubbed off. If a railroad takes a short cut through the country side the wayside inn loses its custom.

But men will not hesitate to move into better houses when they can get them, nor to construct railroads when they can build them, because furniture is damaged in the one case or wayside inns are injured in the other. And if temporary ills shall attend the reform and restoration of our currency to its constitutional bimetallic basis, this is no reason why we should not go on with the good work until it is accomplished.

OUR CURRENCY SYSTEM CONFUSED AND DISTRACTED.

One thing is sure, and that is, that our currency is in a distracted and confused condition, and some reform must come. In what way can it come? If it is proposed to increase the greenback currency, which to-day fills every function of a circulating medium, a shudder runs through Wall street, and a wild cry against fiat paper money goes up to the sky.

If it is suggested that the national banks should meet national wants, the answer is that the national banks are discontinuing their circulation, and the continued reduction of our national bonded debt, on which they rest, is rendering their expansion and increased utility impossible. We must therefore refuse to increase our currency at all or the increase must come in gold or in silver. There is not gold enough in the world to meet the demands of commerce and the debts of nations.

GOLD GOING TO EUROPE TO PAY AMERICAN DEBTS IN EUROPE.

It is contended that our gold would be driven from this country by the free coinage of silver, and that the consequent lack of it here will put it to a premium.

Much of our gold goes annually to Europe to meet interest on Government bonds and on other American securities owned by foreign holders. We are a debtor nation. Germany, France, and England are creditor nations, and gold must go from the debtor to pay the creditor to whom it is due whether we have free coinage of silver or not.

In the report of last year of the Treasury you will find that in the year 1891 more of our currency went to Europe to meet dividends and demands there than all of our increased circulation produced at the Mint and by the Treasury Department. You will find there that in 1891 the net loss in our stock of gold and silver coins by exports and sums used in the arts up to July, 1891, was $70,000,000. This was a greater sum by $7,000,000 than the entire silver coinage of the United States Mint for the same year.

Then, Mr. President, contemplate how our national-bank circulation is going out of existence. In the year 1884 it decreased $16,000,000; in 1885, $20,000,000; in 1886, $6,000,000; in 1887, $37,000,000; in 1888, $40,000,000; in 1890, $25,000,000, and in 1891, $18,000,000. In 1880 our national-bank circulation was $356,000,000; in July, 1891, it was only $167,000,000, showing a net reduction of national-bank circulation of $189,000,000 in eight years.

WHAT IS TO TAKE THE PLACE OF GOLD AND FILL THE GAP MADE BY RETIRING NATIONAL-BANK NOTES?

Now, Mr. President, seeing that gold must go abroad; seeing also that our national-bank circulation is going out of existence; seeing also that there is a firm resistance to any increase of our greenback circulation, what is going to take the place of this vanishing circulation to supply the wants of this ever-increasing nation, if we do not coin the metal which nature has stored in our mines for that purpose?

1. Will we permit ourselves to be bereft of all the moneys we now have and provide no substitute? We produce and coin annually some $30,000,000 in gold—about half a dollar per capita of our population. This is totally inadequate to our monetary needs. What shall we have if not silver?

2. If gold goes abroad and to a premium, the fact that it is at a premium here will bring it back to us. It always rushes toward profit. Its coming back here to get the premium would restore equilibrium to the troubled waters of finance and help to rectify the very evil created.

GOLD WILL GO WHERE BEST INVESTMENTS ARE.

3. Independent of the flow of gold to Europe to pay debt there, which will happen whether we have free coinage of silver or not—why should it go there? Gold is not an idle roamer around the world. It will not go to Europe or anywhere else unless it has something to go for. It will not go there except to invest there, and it will not invest there as long as there is better and enhancing investment here. With our lands increasing in value, with our population increasing in numbers, with our prosperity reassured by financial ease, with our cotton and wheat fields yielding profit to the laborers therein, who is there who believes that gold will run away from this fresh, bountiful, teeming, go-ahead republic to hide itself in the glutted vaults of European banks, or to play for small accretions in sleepy markets.

GRESHAM'S LAW AND SPECIFIC GRAVITY.

Gresham's law will take it there, some say—the law that good currency is driven out by bad. Good currency is hoarded in preference to bad, but good currency does not run away before bad. And what if gold is hoarded? It is already hoarded; it has always been hoarded. But it is not destroyed. When prices are on a rising scale it comes out from its hiding place. When they are falling, as they are now, it rushes into the vaults of banks.

The law of Gresham respecting the currency is nothing but the law of specific gravity as applied to it. If you will take a basin and put into it mercury and oil and water, the mercury having the heaviest specific gravity will sink to the bottom, the oil having the lightest, will rise to the top, but whatever may be the specific gravity of the one fluid or the other, neither one of all their diversities of specific gravity will flow out of the basin until it is filled to the top.

It is the same way, Mr. President, respecting our currency. Whether it be national-bank notes or Treasury notes, whether it consists of gold or of silver, none of our currency is going abroad out of this country until the basin of our wants has been filled to the brim and there is greater necessity for it somewhere else in the world than here.

GOLD HAS LONG BEEN OUT OF CIRCULATION.

So, Mr. President, I dismiss from the calculation of ills which are possible in case silver is freely coined, the declaration that it will drive gold out of circulation and to a premium. We have only to consider the financial history of this country to observe that gold has long since gone out of circulation amongst the people, and it would be a good sight indeed for sore eyes for one of the commoners to see the face of a gold dollar. Travel on the railroad, go to the theater, move about in the marts of exchange anywhere, and you never anywhere see a gold dollar. I have had the honor to be in the service of this Government for some six years, and I have performed the duty of drawing my salary with all the punctuality of an attentive statesman, but never in all that time has the Government tendered to me even so much as one gold dollar. If I were to seek to get one to-morrow as a curiosity, I know not where I should go to find it.

The disadvantages of the free coinage of silver have already been discounted by the course of events and the tenor of facts, and it remains for us to offset against them the advantages of free coinage, which all realize to be great.

EUROPEAN WAR ON AMERICAN SILVER.

Mr. President, this is a silver-producing nation, producing 40 per cent, two-fifths of all the silver of the world. Great Britain and the other nations of Europe who are combined against the free coinage of silver are only making war against an American product, for they have it not, and they war for what they have and against what America has.

If God had cursed our mines with barrenness of silver product, you would hear nothing against the free coinage of silver metal. It would be proclaimed far and near, in all the highways of exchange and by all the metropolitan journals, just as it was proclaimed in 1847 when gold had become plentiful from its discovery in California, that silver was the best money in the world and that gold was only the cheap money of other nations.

Mr. President, I ask leave of the Senate to append to my remarks a letter addressed to me, and which I received this morning, from Mr. William P. St. John, a distinguished financier of New York, which is apropos of the discussion which I have just made. He is one of the few bankers who has taken the country's side, the people's side—the side of intellectual reach and broad patriotism. Would that there were more like him!

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

THE MERCANTILE NATIONAL BANK OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
New York, April 25, 1892.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 20th instant, which came to the bank on Saturday, with a promise on my behalf that I would reply to-day.

In answering your first inquiry I beg to say that the trade returns between the United States and Great Britain during the period of five years ending 1890 show a balance of trade against Great Britain in favor of the United States of $1,945,179,923, or an average annual balance in favor of the United States of $389,000,000. The movement during the year ending June 30, 1891, shows a trade balance against Great Britain and in favor of the United States of $250,690,764.

Taking the trade between the United States and the entire commercial world at present, and we may assume prospectively the difference is only in degree, which means that we are generally creditor in trade. Therefore, except for foreign investments in our securities and capricious balances either way, occasioned thereby, also except for the foreign expenditures by our traveling public, the United States is now and will likely continue to be, as David Barbour, the British finance secretary to India, asserts, "The most independent of the foreigner among the nations."

It is thus the actual fact that there is nothing upon which to base a prediction of a continuing premium upon gold when our mints are equally open to the coinage of gold and silver. Any temporary premium on gold in our money centers would attract gold to those centers, as against gold remaining in centers where it was not at a premium. A premium abroad in more than one instance in the last two years has attracted gold abroad. A premium on it here would return it here with alike attraction. Laveleye, sharing the opinion of Barbour, has declared as late as March, 1891, that the opening of our mints to silver, if it proved a failure, would be more expensive to Europe than to the United States as the consequence.

The sole degree in which we could possibly suffer by a premium on gold in New York would be limited by the brief period of time in which that excessive demand served to induce the gold in our direction as the best employment offered for it, ceasing with its arrival here or earlier. The Bank of England has established a premium on her only money, gold, thirteen times during a single twelve months by the alteration of her bank rate for discounts. The Bank of France held her bank rate without change at 3 per cent during the entire same period.

An inexcusable misconception exists in the association of our greenback issue, and its relation to both gold and silver, with our silver coinage in relation to our gold coinage under equally free coinage for both metals at a fixed ratio. The latter relation is that of two equally unlimited legal-tender primary moneys. The former, the greenback, was not unlimited legal tender, but was a promise of money, either gold or silver. The greenback was not accepted at the custom-house, and is not legally so accepted to-day.

If there were any possibility of a fulfillment of the prediction of an avalanche of Europe's silver at our reopened mints the predicted premium on gold would be short-lived, for the reason that the tendency of that premium to retain gold here would soon occasion the overabundant money volume that would deny to gold and silver both a profitable employment as money. There would be nothing more surprising to the popular banking thought than the actual effect on gold of any such result of the reopening of our mints.

With the United States on a silver basis, as in the far East, the trade conditions which I have reported would be the more confirmed, for a time at least, and always to some extent. To every such degree Laveleye's prediction would be fulfilled, that Europe would be the only sufferer. Please note, too, that except for the British taxation in gold imposed on India, India would really be careless of the gold and silver question. You must have observed recent newspaper intimations that India, like Austria and Italy and the Argentine Republic, is soon to adopt a single gold basis. It may have escaped attention that British India is the one invariable creditor among the nations annually and every year.

Were India to adopt the gold standard, therefore, she would denude the commercial world of gold before some of our ablest financiers could account for it or would make that discovery.

Yours, very truly,

HON. JOHN W. DANIEL,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

WM. P. ST. JOHN.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6923.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does the Senator propose to take up the army appropriation bill?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; the army appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I asked the Senate yesterday afternoon to proceed to the consideration of a resolution, which was taken up and is the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, when it will be laid before the Senate. My intention was to lay it aside informally for the purpose of taking up the army appropriation bill, but I do not want the appropriation bill taken up by a vote, for that would displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it would not, if taken up before 2 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. It is now so near 2 o'clock that I ask that the resolution which the Senator from Arkansas has in charge be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the army appropriation bill. That will answer the purpose.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to proceeding with the army appropriation bill until 2 o'clock, and then allowing the unfinished business to be laid aside informally to continue its consideration.

Mr. STEWART. It is now within a minute of 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada, before the hour of 2 o'clock, moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the army appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6923) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with and the bill will be read for amendment.

Mr. STEWART. And the committee amendments will be considered first, and acted on as reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments will be considered as they are reached in the reading, in the absence of objection.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations "for pay of officers of the line," on page 1, line 12, after the word "pay," to insert "and allowances of a mounted officer;" and, in line 13, after the word "rank," to strike out "without any additions thereto;" so as to make the clause read:

FOR PAY OF OFFICERS OF THE LINE.

For pay of officers of the line, $2,831,939: Provided, That hereafter any officer performing the duty of adjutant, regimental quartermaster, aid to major or brigadier-general, or acting commissary of subsistence, shall receive the pay and allowances of a mounted officer of his rank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays the unfinished business before the Senate, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution by Mr. JONES of Arkansas, relative to the President's message of February 18, 1892.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside in order to proceed with the Army appropriation bill. If there be no objection, that course will be taken. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations "for pay of enlisted men," on page 2, line 13, after the word "messengers," to insert "to the number and;" and in line 14, after the words "one hundred and," to strike out "sixty thousand" and insert "sixty-one thousand nine hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

For general-service clerks and messengers, to the number and at the rate now fixed by law, $161,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for pay of the general staff," on page 5, line 7, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to duty as acting paymasters the officers acting as quartermasters or commissaries of posts or camps or of troops in the field; and officers so assigned shall, under proper regulations to be established by the President, making the regular payment to the troops with which they are serving, and shall be authorized and required to perform the same duties as are now performed by the officers of the Pay Department of the Army: Provided further,

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no appointments shall be made to the grade of major in the Pay Department of the Army until the number of majors in that Department is reduced below twenty, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 5, line 18, after the word "below," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five;" and after the words "fixed at," at the end of line 19, to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

That no appointments shall be made to the grade of major in the Pay Department of the Army until the number of majors in that Department is reduced below twenty-five, and thereafter the number of officers of that grade in the Pay Department shall be fixed at twenty-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 5, after the word "paymaster," at the end of line 22, to strike out "or acting assistant paymaster;" so as to read:

And provided further, That the Secretary of War is also authorized to arrange for the payment of the enlisted men serving at posts or places where no paymaster is on duty, by check or by currency, to be sent to them by mail or express, at the expense and risk of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "miscellaneous," on page 7, line 14, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "thirty-five paymasters" and insert "thirty-eight paymasters;" and in line 18, after the word "Department," to strike out "eighty thousand" and insert "eighty-four thousand two hundred;" so as to read:

For pay of not exceeding thirty-eight paymasters' clerks, at $1,400 each; not exceeding thirty paymasters' messengers, and traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks and expert accountant of the Inspector-General's Department, $81,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 4, after the word "buildings," to strike out "and so forth" and insert "and grounds;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional pay to officer in charge of public buildings and grounds in Washington, D. C., $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 7, after the words "for the," to strike out "Inspector-General" and insert "Inspector-General's Department, to be appointed hereafter, in case of vacancy, by the Secretary of War;" so as to make the clause read:

For one expert accountant for the Inspector-General's Department, to be appointed hereafter, in case of vacancy, by the Secretary of War, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 15, after the word "information," to insert "from abroad;" and in line 16, after the words "dollars," to insert "and the officers detailed to obtain the same shall be entitled to mileage and transportation and also commutation of quarters while on this duty, as provided when on other duty;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of a clerk attendant on the collection and classification of military information abroad, $1,500; and the officers detailed to obtain the same shall be entitled to mileage and transportation and also commutation of quarters while on this duty, as provided when on other duty.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the object in inserting that clause? Of course all officers traveling under orders from the Secretary of War, whether at home or abroad, are entitled to mileage or transportation. There seems to be no reason for inserting this clause, unless it may be to lay the foundation for extended trips abroad by officers. In other words, I can not conceive that there is any need of this clause. I do not understand that there is any limit whatever to the authority of the President, or of the Secretary of War, to order officers to travel and to pay them therefor.

Mr. STEWART. The object was to make their compensation definite so that there should be no additional allowance. It was thought necessary to define it so that they would have the same allowance while on that duty as on any other.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is not this very provision the law now?

Mr. STEWART. There was some doubt expressed about that, and the committee thought it best to make it definite. It does not enlarge the power so far as that is concerned, but makes it definite.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to offer an amendment, which I believe will be acceptable to the committee.

Mr. STEWART. We are going through with the committee amendments now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it an amendment to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. QUAY. It is an amendment to the part of the bill now reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. QUAY. Not to the amendment; it is an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. STEWART. Where does it come in?

Mr. QUAY. It comes in between lines 13 and 14, on page 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information. The order of the Senate is that the bill is now being read for action upon the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. QUAY. Then my amendment, unless received by unanimous consent, will not be in order at this time.

Mr. STEWART. I believe I know what the amendment is. Although I would not like to have action upon the committee amendments broken in upon again, I think the amendment may be read for information, and if it is what I think it is perhaps it is well enough to adopt it.

Mr. QUAY. I think the amendment will be acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, after line 13, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That officers temporarily absent on duty in the field, with troops or otherwise, shall not lose their right to quarters or commutation thereof at their permanent station while so temporarily absent: And provided further, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to credit disbursing officers of the Army with the amount of any such sums as may have been charged against them on account of payment of commutation of quarters to officers temporarily absent from their permanent station.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reception of the amendment?

Mr. STEWART. I do not object to it.

Mr. QUAY. Then I ask unanimous consent that it may be agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to it. I believe that is the law now if it is properly construed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 9, line 21, to increase the total amount of the appropriations "for pay and general expenses of the Army" from "$13,293,049.82" to "$13,299,149.82."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Quartermaster's Department," on page 13, line 6, after the words "gardens or," to strike out "canteens" and insert "exchanges, but this proviso shall not be construed to prohibit the use by post exchanges of public buildings or public transportation when not required for other purposes, or the purchase of subsistence or quartermaster's supplies at the same rates as officers are now allowed to purchase such supplies;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That hereafter no money appropriated for the support of the Army shall be expended for post gardens or exchanges, but this proviso shall not be construed to prohibit the use by post exchanges of public buildings or public transportation when not required for other purposes, or the purchase of subsistence or quartermaster's supplies at the same rates as officers are now allowed to purchase such supplies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 21, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for "incidental expenses" from "$2,660,000" to "$2,850,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 22, after the word "service," to strike out:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by the Union Pacific Railway Company, including the lines of the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway Company or by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

Mr. COCKRELL. I disagreed with the full Committee on Appropriations in striking that provision out, and think it ought to be retained in the bill. I will not take any action upon the amendment now, but will reserve it until the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that I agree with the House provision, and I think it should be retained in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri desires to reserve the amendment for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will reserve it for action in the Senate. I will not contest it here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 18, line 16, after the word "as," to insert "far as;" so as to read:

And the erection, construction, and repair of all buildings and other public structures in the Quartermaster's Department shall, as far as may be practicable, be made by contract, after due legal advertisement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "barracks and quarters," on page 18, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred" and insert "one hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

And provided further, That no more than $1,150,000 of the sums appropriated by this act shall be paid out for the services of civilian employes in the Quartermaster's Department, including those heretofore paid out of the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing and camp and garrison equipage, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 17, before the word "quarters," to insert the word "such;" so as to make the clause read:

For construction of quarters for hospital stewards at military posts already established and occupied, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same, $7,000: Provided, That the posts at which such quarters shall be constructed shall be designated by the Secretary of War, and such quarters shall be built by contract, after legal advertisement, whenever the same is practicable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Medical Department," in line 23, after the word "over," to strike out "forty" and insert "forty-five;" so as to read:

Medical and Hospital Department: For the purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including disinfectants for general post sanitation, expenses of medical purveying depots, and pay of employes, medical care and treatment of officers and enlisted men of the Army and Signal Corps on duty at posts and stations for which no other provision is made, for the proper care and treatment of cases in the Army suffering from contagious and epidemic diseases, and the supply of the Army and Navy general hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., advertising, and other miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department, $170,000; and not over $45,000 of the money appropriated by this paragraph shall be applied to the payment of civilian employes of the Medical Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten;" and in line 8, after the word "all," to strike out "twelve" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Medical Museum and Library: For Army Medical Museum, preservation of specimens, and the preparation or purchase of new specimens, $5,000; for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, $10,000; in all, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Ordnance Department," on page 23, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

For repairing and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores in the hands of troops and for issue at the arsenals and depots, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 7, after the words "one hundred," to insert "and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For purchase and manufacture of ordnance stores to fill requisitions of troops, $120,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments, including horse equipments for cavalry and artillery, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty," and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For firing the morning and evening gun at military posts, prescribed by General Orders, numbered 70, Headquarters of the Army, dated July 23, 1867, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 20, to insert:

For purchase of machine guns, musket caliber, of American manufacture, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the clause making appropriations "for manufacture of arms at the national armories," on page 24, line 7, after the word "dollars," to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That not more than $60,000 of the money appropriated for the Ordnance Department in all its branches shall be applied to the payment of civilian clerks in said Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "contingent expenses," on page 25, line 8, after the word "general," to insert "in his discretion;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the office of the Commanding General, in his discretion, $1,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, in line 11, after the word "military," to insert "divisions and;" in the same line, after the word "departments," to insert "including the staff corps serving thereat;" in line 14, after the word "reference," to insert "and;" in the same line, after the word "utensils," to strike out "and so forth, too," and insert "three;" and in line 15, after the word "dollars," to insert "to be allotted by the Secretary of War;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses at the headquarters of the several military divisions and departments, including the staff corps working thereat, being for the purchase of the necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture, binding, maps, books of reference, and police utensils, $3,000, to be allotted by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, to strike out the last clause in the bill, beginning in line 16, in the following words:

Contingencies, Inspector-General's Department: For contingent expenses of the Inspector-General's Department at the headquarters, being for the necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture, stationery, binding, maps, books of reference, professional literature, and police utensils, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be taken in gross with the exception of the amendment reserved by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], if there be no objection.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reserved by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 22, after the word "service," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the proviso, the words stricken out being as follows:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by the Union Pacific Railway Company, including the lines of the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway Company, or by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out the proviso which has been read.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon an objection to this amendment. If the provision were ever so just we are in no position to act upon it. We do not know what roads are under the control of the Union Pacific Railroad and the Central Pacific Railroad or the parties who are interested in the branch roads. There is no report to show what roads this would require payment from or how sweeping it would be, and how the parties stand with regard to the Union and Central Pacific Railroads and all the roads that are under the control of those two systems. They have branches extending all over the country. Other parties are interested in them. Before we can undertake this new legislation we ought to have some information upon that subject.

The question of settling the indebtedness of the Pacific Railroads has been intrusted to a select commission, which has taken testimony, and when that is settled, the whole matter ought to be settled together. Besides, this question has been before the Supreme Court. In the first place, the Supreme Court has decided that the interest is not due from these railroads until the maturity of the principal debt other than as provided for by the statutes; that there is no money due from them that can be offset. If it had been ascertained whether the parties that you propose to charge here have anything to do with this obligation, the provision could be understood.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit a suggestion right in that connection?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The whole question as to the interest on these bonds being payable at any time before the maturity of the bonds, as a matter of course, has been settled by a decision of the Supreme Court, but that decision of the Supreme Court does not prohibit Congress, or interfere with the right or power or duty of Congress to compel those roads to make provision for the payment of this great accumulation of sixty odd million dollars of interest, which will become payable in fact by the course of law when the $64,000,000 of bonds become due. We have a perfect right to control the companies so as to make them provide a sinking fund, or a fund for the payment of the debt. There are $64,000,000 of Government bonds loaned or advanced to the companies. The interest is running on them at 6 per cent. If we made no provision for it the interest, by the time the bonds mature, will amount to probably $125,000,000 all together, in addition to the $64,000,000 of principal. It would amount to something over $100,000,000.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will let me complete my statement he will see what my position is.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to that point, so that he would cover it.

Mr. STEWART. I understand it, and I agree with the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is as to providing a sinking fund?

Mr. STEWART. I agree that it is a large indebtedness. We first passed a law providing a sinking fund, and they are operating under that, and now we have appointed a committee, and they are working on a settlement of this whole matter. I concur with the Senator that it ought to be settled, and we ought to have legislation; Congress ought to give its attention to the subject, but what I object to in this legislation—

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that that committee has not met during this Congress. We are not doing anything.

Mr. STEWART. It exists for this purpose. The matter ought to be settled, but it can not be investigated without a report from somebody so as to ascertain the facts. We do not want to collect any of this money from outsiders who have nothing to do with its payment.

I refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of The United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company in 98 United States Reports, page 614. There the question is discussed and the court decide that the interest is not due until the maturity of the bonds. In that the Senator from Missouri concurs with me. But the identical question which is here presented has been before the Supreme Court, whether outside railroads could be charged, and the court hold that they could not. Now, I will read from the opinion of the court in the United States vs. The Central Pacific Railroad Company:

The syllabus of the case states it pretty clearly:

The act of July 1, 1862, "to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean" (12 Stat., 489), and the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat., 359), amending the same, and the act of May 7, 1878 (20 Stat., 56), commonly called the Thurman act, are in pari materia and to be construed together; and so construed the act of May 7, 1868, restores provisions of the act of 1862 respecting retention of compensation for services performed by the railroads of the United States which had been changed by the amendment of 1864, and requires the Treasury to withhold all payments for services performed on the roads constructed by the aid of Government grants, but not on roads owned or operated by the same companies which were not constructed with such aid.

When a contract is open to two constructions, the one lawful and the other unlawful, the former must be adopted. (Hobbs vs. McLean, 117 U. S., 567, affirmed.)

They say it would be unlawful for the Government to withhold compensation from these nonaided roads, and in commenting upon it they use very strong language. On page 240 the court say:

There is another view of this controversy which seems to us conclusive. As the contract between the United States and the railroad company, contained in the acts of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, has been interpreted by this court to authorize the retention by the Government of compensation for services only on those roads which the United States aided in building, the construction which the appellants seek to put on the second section of the act of May 8, 1878, would not only render that section a breach of faith on the part of the United States, but an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellees. We are bound, if possible, so to construe the law as to lay it open to neither of these objections. (Broughton vs. Pensacola, 93 U. S., 206; Red Rock vs. Henry, 106 U. S., 596; Hobbs vs. McLean, 117 U. S., 567, decided at the present term, and cases there cited; United States vs. Combs, 12 Pet., 72.) The construction contended for by the appellee preserves the good faith of the Government and frees the act from the imputation of impairing rights secured by the Constitution of the United States.

This was the identical question which the Supreme Court say would be an invasion of constitutional rights, and that comes up here to be acted upon without any report from the committee, without any ascertainment of the fact as to what roads there are that are in this general system operated by them, when the same persons operate a road, no matter who is entitled to the dividends, or who owns the road, or whose money it is, or how it affects bondholders or stockholders anywhere; and we are to compel them to transport for the United States without compensation.

Now, if any person thinks this is justifiable he should produce a report and show us what is the effect. Certainly we ought to wait for a report of the committee, because the Supreme Court say it is an invasion of constitutional rights to withhold the compensation for carrying freight from these other companies. But Congress might act perhaps if it had ascertained the fact about these other roads. It seems to me, to attempt to settle the Pacific Railroad question on an appropriation bill by this new legislation, would get us into interminable difficulties.

Mr. COCKRELL. The provision of the House bill does not undertake to settle and adjust all the relations existing between these Government-aided roads and the Government. We have a provision in the bill as it came to us, and necessity compelled the Appropriation Committee of the other House to put it in, that these aided railroads should not receive more than 50 per cent of the full amount of service to be paid. This is only another method that Congress is attempting to exercise for the purpose of securing the people against the payment of this enormous sum of money, $64,000,000 interest, for which they are liable, and the first lien upon these roads to secure the payment of which was voluntarily released by Congress. It is no difficult problem to ascertain the number of these roads, if anything were necessary. If there should any claim that the Union Pacific—

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator contend that the Government has got any lien upon the system of roads under the control of these two companies? I understand that a branch comes here to Newport News, and there are roads all through the country controlled by them.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no pretence that this clause would reach that far.

Mr. STEWART. It says all roads under their control.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. STEWART. It would reach them all. It is broad enough.

Mr. COCKRELL. The language is—by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

That would not extend to the Atlantic.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator think it is fair?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, I do. I think when the United States paid to these corporations in lands and bonds enough to build their roads without another dollar, and when these corporations have refused to reimburse the United States for the interest they have paid upon the bonds, and by influences not to be discussed just now secured from Congress a release of the first lien the United States held upon the roads and their property, and have turned the proceeds of their roads and the speculative profits of what the Government granted them in lands and bonds into the construction of these roads, the United States has a right to follow that property wherever it may go and enforce its lien. I think it is equitable and just. I do not think any Government has ever been treated as the United States Government has been treated by these bonded railroads.

Mr. FRYE. But is there any violation on the part of the railroads of the agreements which Congress made with them?

Mr. COCKRELL. There may be no technical violation in the strict legal sense of the word, and yet, morally and equitably, there has been a total disregard of what the masses of this country believe were the rights granted to those companies and the rights reserved to the United States. I know that the Supreme Court has decided, for example, that the interest on these bonds does not become enforceable at the instance of the United States in a court of justice until the bonds become due, and yet I doubt whether a Senator or Representative, with a few exceptions—precious few indeed—when that law was passed, dreamed of such a construction as that.

Mr. FRYE. But it is the law of the land.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is true. That act of Congress, skillfully, artistically drawn for the benefit of the corporate monopolies created and protected by it, has been construed in that way. As a matter of course that ends the legal remedy, but it does not end the right and the duty of the Congress of the United States to protect the taxpayers from the payment of this $64,000,000 of bonds and the accumulating interest upon those bonds up to the date of their maturity; and we would be recreant to the trust delegated to us by the people if we did not attempt to secure remuneration and repayment of those sums.

Now, these companies may say technically that we can not enforce by law any lien upon these roads built by the aid granted by the United States to these corporate monopolies, that we can not enforce by law a lien upon their income and dividends to reimburse us for what the Union Pacific Company owes; but we may enact laws, and in that way we can protect ourselves against loss and damage.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator think it would be just to enact laws to tax companies which received no aid from the Government, whose stockholders are not stockholders in these other companies, and who had no connection with them, but put their money in these roads, because the roads which they own are under the control of the general system made necessary to carry on trade? Would he withhold payment from persons who had nothing to do with the Pacific railroads? I want to know whether he would do that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes. The persons in these companies—
Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator know what persons are in these companies?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will explain what I mean. I mean the few persons who have an interest in these companies simply amount to nothing. It is these two great monopolies, created by the United States, which are reaping all the profits and have all the liabilities of these companies. The original stockholders who built these roads have leased them to these two great corporations, and they get whatever these corporations permit them to receive, and they get it independent of this legislation. This legislation does not affect them at all.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator know whether or not the stockholders in these nonaided roads are the stockholders who received the bounty of the Government? Does he know that fact?

Mr. COCKRELL. If that fact does not exist the law does not operate, does it?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, the law operates if those roads are branches of this company.

Mr. COCKRELL. It makes no difference who the stockholders are, the persons who manage the roads get the cream.

Mr. STEWART. Would the Senator take away the property of the bondholders and stockholders who have liens upon these roads, and who have had nothing to do with these matters? Is it not proper, before you take the property of these private parties, before you pass a law to confiscate their property, to at least secure the report of some competent committee or commission and ascertain what the respective rights of the parties may be? It seems to me that if we are to retain this provision in the bill without a report and take money away from people who had nothing to do with these transactions, we should be imposing a wrong upon them.

We ought to know the facts. We have a committee investigating the facts, and we have no right to take A's property to pay B's debts because B is indebted to us. Whether anything is due or not, we have no report upon which to found any such legislation. Because the world is bad, are we to say that we shall kill everybody? That is the nihilist's theory, who would kill everybody because the world is bad, without trying to separate the good from the evil. If these parties are to be charged with this, there should be an investigation to know who owes the amount.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I objected to striking out this provision in the House bill. We might admit all that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] says upon this subject, and yet a reasonable prudence for the protection of the people and their money would require that this payment should not be made before the facts are ascertained. Why shall these companies not wait until the people ascertain whether or not they are the same parties to whom the bounty of the Government was paid? Therefore, it seems to me, as there is a reasonable probability, as the inquiry has been made here, as the fact has been affirmed time and time again in both Houses of Congress that this was the money of the people that had been improperly applied by these same stockholders of the nonbonded lines and for their benefit and that an equity followed that money into these corporations—it seems entirely proper that until that fact is ascertained to be untrue the people's money should not be appropriated for their benefit.

For that reason I thought the provision of the House was a proper one. It settles nothing. It simply withholds the payment of this money until some future time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who seems to be familiar with this bill, inform me whether it is the intention of the bill to pay a larger compensation to the branch roads of the Pacific system for the transportation of mails than is paid the Pacific roads themselves, the aided roads?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; there is no question about that; and the Senator will see that we take out of the aided roads 50 per cent and we take nothing out of the others. There is just that difference.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to know upon what principle it is that the Central and the Union Pacific Railroad Companies can invest the money that belongs to the Government in branch lines all over the country, holding in their own treasuries nearly all of the stock—perhaps some of the bonds, but the stock—that has been issued for the construction of these lines of railroad, to-day the property of these two great corporations, and they themselves compelled to furnish the Government transportation for 50 per cent and then in turn take their own property, their own branch lines, and claim for them full compensation?

The investigation of this subject by the late commission, which was sent out under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, showed the fact that both the Central and the Union Pacific Railroads had disposed of some of the bonds and securities of these branch lines, and wherever the branch lines did not pay scarcely any of the stock has ever been alienated from either the Union or Central Pacific Railroads because there was no market for those securities. Where the securities were worthless, as most of them are, they remained in the treasuries of the Union and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies as so much assets upon which they could float other securities in the market. This accumulation of branch-line securities has been made a potent factor in securing a new subsidy from the Government by way of extension of time and reduced interest.

It was further shown that as to some one of these branch lines there was a contract made between the parent or trunk line, and these different corporations, the branch lines, for constructive mileage. The Government aids the trunk line and it in turn subsidizes its own branches at the Government expense. These properties to-day are owned by the Central and the Union Pacific Railroad Companies mainly. They represent it. The roads were built contrary to law, without warrant of law, and I may further say in direct violation of law.

Now it is proposed, as I understand, in the army bill to take all these branch lines of railroad owned by these corporations and to give them full rates of transportation upon those lines and only withhold the rebate upon the work absolutely done upon the main trunk lines. It seems to me as though that was a most extraordinary performance.

If there is any reason whatever either in law or in justice by which the Government should exact from the Central or the Union Pacific systems a rate of compensation for carrying the mails and for carrying troops less than the usual rates charged upon other lines of railroad that are under no obligations whatever to this Government, then it is equally true and equally just that the same thing should be imposed upon these branch lines. There is no reason or justice in any other view of the question.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the Senator does not reach the difficulty at all; he does not reach the objections. In the first place, this is new legislation on an appropriation bill, which is against the rule. In the next place, I again state that there is no fact before the Senate showing whether or not these branch roads belong to the Union and Central Pacific Companies. My information is that they do not. That question ought to be settled. My information is that there are a great many stockholders and bondholders outside.

The language used here is most sweeping. Let me read it, and see what it is proposed to do:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by the Union Pacific Railway Company, including the lines of the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway Company or by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

We have no information as to the extent of that system or as to how many roads are brought in.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will take the report made by the late commission which investigated the whole railroad system of the aided lines, he will find the number, the character, and the kind of securities held in their treasuries by the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies as a part of the assets of those companies.

Mr. STEWART. Of what companies?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Of the Union and Central Pacific Companies, as part of their assets as for money expended or securities held by reason of money expended by them for the construction of these lines.

Mr. STEWART. In what part of report on the Central Pacific system shall we find those facts?

Mr. MCPHERSON. They will be found in the report of the investigation.

Mr. STEWART. What part of the system does it cover?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Central Pacific system, the Union Pacific system, the Kansas Pacific system.

Mr. STEWART. It is a question whether it is or not. I undertake to say that before we legislate, we ought to have the report of a committee on so important a matter as that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understood the Senator to say this was a new law.

Mr. STEWART. I say it is new legislation.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I think it would have been well for the committee to understand as to the ownership of these branch lines and how much these companies represented before they undertook to increase the compensation upon the branch lines.

Mr. STEWART. I think we ought to understand it. The other House presents no report and no facts are stated here. We are legislating in the dark with regard to these companies against the decision of the Supreme Court, which says such legislation is in violation of constitutional rights. We have no right to do it. The Supreme Court has decided the very question. Compensation was withheld over these same roads by the Post-Office Department, the case went before the Supreme Court, and the court said to withhold payment was an invasion of constitutional rights.

We have not had any report to show that the Supreme Court were mistaken, to show that there was any predicate for such a demand on the part of the Government. I think this kind of legislation upon an appropriation bill, without the ascertainment of those facts, is unreasonable, and is putting the cart before the horse. The select committee having the subject in charge will bring in a solution at an early day of this whole question, and when we do act we ought to include those companies that are indebted to the Government, and nobody else.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, for information largely, for it is to sufficiently develop the facts that I suppose exist, I will ask the Senator from Nevada what corporation is it that is the debtor of the United States Government?

Mr. STEWART. The Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Companies are debtors.

Mr. PALMER. Presuming that is so, is there anything unjust in withholding payment from any railroad "owned, controlled, or operated" which is a Government debtor? It is not too much, I suppose, to charge any particular line of railway with the cost of transportation of troops, but I suppose its purpose is to reach the debtor of the Government. The provision amounts to this, that the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company shall not be paid for service performed on any of their lines out of this appropriation. I understand it is not to reach a particular company, but it is to reach a particular debtor to the Government; that is, that the Union Pacific Company, which is the debtor of the Government, shall not be paid for any service which it may render the Government from this appropriation.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator will allow me?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. From the Union and the Central Pacific Companies the Government withholds one-half of the transportation under the contract, and that is all it can withhold under the contract. Here, where there is no contract and no fact showing a liability, outside companies, because they are managed or controlled by these companies that are required to pay into the Treasury one-half of the freight (and you can only take one-half from them under the contract), you propose to take it all from the others without investigation whether they owe anything or not, and do it in an appropriation bill. It seems to me that is a kind of legislation that is not wise.

Mr. PALMER. I will say, by way of answer to the Senator from Nevada, that if these roads are owned, controlled, or operated by the Government debtor, if on the principle that the Government debtor is realizing all the profits to result from their operation and it goes into the treasury of this corporation, which is the debtor of the Government, and it is material to inquire from what sources it is derived, it is enough that we seek to withhold from our debtor compensation for this service, proposing to charge that debtor with the value of the service rendered the Government.

Has the Supreme Court of the United States ever held that you may not look to the particular corporation which is your debtor, and that you may withhold from that particular corporation such compensation for services as will be paid from this appropriation?

I have no prejudice against these railroad companies, but it seems to me that this affords an opportunity for retaining in the Treasury money that ought to be paid into the Treasury by these corporations. It seems to me it is but just and fair that that should be done; it is simply keeping the money of your debtor. It seems to me in this case the doctrine of set-off properly applies.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not care to mingle in this discussion. I agreed to the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations for reasons which were satisfactory to me at the time, and I have seen nothing in this debate to change my opinions.

Our relations to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway Companies are perhaps not what they ought to be. We have seen, and we do see, a largely and constantly accumulating debt of these two companies upon their lines of railway, secured to us by a second mortgage. When the statute of 1864 was passed it provided that one-half, as I remember it—perhaps that was the original act of 1862—

Mr. STEWART. By the act of 1862 the Government retained it all, and by the act of 1864 it retained one-half.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. The act of 1864 retained one-half of the compensation due from the Government for transportation, whether of mails, of munitions of war, troops, etc., and 5 per cent of the net earnings. Under that act the Supreme Court decided, as I remember, Associate Justice Davis delivering the opinion, that pro tanto these earnings and this 5 per cent should be applied to the interest, but whatever interest was not paid by the application of these earnings would not become due until the principal sum became due. It has been under the operation of those two provisions that the debt is accumulating so far as interest is concerned.

In 1878, it will be remembered, that we had an adjustment with these companies under what is known as the Thurman act, which was an act intended to provide for a sinking fund which would in a sense meet these accumulations of interest. That sinking-fund act provided, as I remember it—I have not examined it recently, and may in some details be mistaken—that the half transportation due from the Government should be applied presently to the interest and that the other half should be paid into the Treasury and constitute a sinking fund to be invested and reinvested by the Government from time to time in securities, and that in addition to that 25 per cent of the net earnings of these companies should be applied to the sinking fund, and that these two funds together should be made a fund applicable to these accumulations of interest and the payment of the principal sum.

The railroad companies, I believe, resisted that legislation as unconstitutional. The Supreme Court decided that it was constitutional because it did not take the money of these corporations and apply that money to any purpose other than the payment of the companies' debts, and that for the purpose of making these arrangements Congress had the power to take from these railroad companies a certain portion of their earnings to be applied to a sinking fund.

I think one case was decided before by the Supreme Court wherein one-half of the earnings of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company—if that is the name of the corporation that was subsidized for a part of its way and not subsidized for the remainder—could only have taken from it one-half of its earnings on the subsidized portion of the road, for the reason, as the Supreme Court stated, that that was the particular segregation of earnings that was meant in the law. In another case the court decided that the earnings of nonaided roads could not be applied to the uses and purposes of the Government, although, as I have not examined with care, I am not sure that legislation such as is proposed now has ever been put upon the statute book as respects branches and lines controlled by or operated by either one of these great corporations.

It is true that the Union Pacific Railway Company has built numerous branches, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] says, in violation of law. He may be correct in that statement, although my recollection is quite different. My understanding is that the policy of the Government has been, as respects these branches, rather to encourage than not to encourage them. So, I believe as respects the Union Pacific Railway Company, its branches now have a greater number of miles than the principal company, although I am not familiar with these details.

Mr. STEWART. Very many more miles.

Mr. ALLISON. I know that it has been their policy not only to encourage the building of branches, but, to some extent, to lease railroads. I am told—I do not know with what truth—that the Union Pacific Railroad Company has now leased a line from Denver to Galveston, or at least as far as Fort Worth, although they did not construct a mile of it nor invest a dollar in it; but they have leased that line. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] says that if they operate that road it is his present opinion that we have a right to say that for that operation we shall hold the entire charge, whatever it may be, and apply it to what? Because if we hold this charge we have a right to apply it to something; that we shall hold all these earnings and apply them to the payment pro tanto of the second-mortgage bonds which we hold upon the Union Pacific Railway Company, extending westward from Omaha 1,100 miles.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] says that this railroad company—and I have no doubt it is true—has sold the bonds of these branch lines, and these bonds are held by the public hither and thither.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very few of them or none of them, except the lines that have been paid.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly, but there are a good many of those. It is doubtless true as respects the Fort Worth line, a line of a good many miles—I do not know how many, five or six or seven hundred miles—

Mr. STEWART. The Southern Pacific line is 2,000 miles. Mr. ALLISON. Two thousand miles of road. So also with the Oregon Short Line. The bonds of these companies have been sold. Now, I should like to ask whether or not it is equitable for the Government of the United States to say that these branch lines, if you call them branch lines, or these leased lines, which have never been constructed by either of these companies, shall apply all these earnings to the payment of the second mortgage of the Government, which is not due for several years, to the exclusion of the people who have purchased these bonds in the open market, and are in the expectation, at least, that interest will be paid to them as the interest matures semiannually?

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know what the Senator means by the words "all these earnings?" Do they include anything more than the pay which the United States themselves give to these companies for particular services. Does it extend beyond that?

Mr. ALLISON. I am speaking now of those earnings.

Mr. GEORGE. Those are the earnings?

Mr. ALLISON. Those are the earnings. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that this provision in the Army bill is also found in another bill which provides for the transmission of the mails of the United States over these railways.

Mr. MORGAN. What bill is that?

Mr. ALLISON. The Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. That has not come in yet.

Mr. ALLISON. That has not come in here yet, but I say it is found in that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. In just the same phrase?

Mr. ALLISON. In substantially the same phrase.

Now, whilst the army transportation is a small transportation, yet when you come to apply the postal expenditures upon four or five thousand miles or two or three thousand miles, if you please—I do not know the extent of these branch or leased lines—most of them running through an unsettled country and most of them probably, as the Senator from New Jersey says, unproductive in respect to having surplus earnings over and above their fixed charges, or probably some of them not having money enough to pay the running expenses of the roads, it seems to me that it is a pretty harsh measure for the Congress of the United States as respects these lines to say by legislation, by the power we have here, that we will withhold all these earnings and put them in our pocket to pay a debt which is not yet due.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I am very anxious to get at the merits of this controversy.

Mr. ALLISON. I am myself, and perhaps I am not contributing much to that.

Mr. GEORGE. I think you are, and I want some information. I have been sick and have just come in. I want to know what is right.

Mr. ALLISON. I know the Senator does.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know what the proposition is. What I want to know is this: Is the proposition of this amendment that the Government of the United States shall retain as a set-off that which the Government owes or which might become due by the Government to these railroad companies and apply this set-off to a debt which the railroad companies owe the Government?

Mr. ALLISON. No, that is not the proposition.

Mr. GEORGE. Is not that the proposition?

Mr. ALLISON. It proposes simply this: The ultimate logical result of that further legislation might be what the Senator suggests perhaps if we had that power, but this simply proposes that no payment shall be made to these railway companies owned, controlled, leased, or operated by either one of these two subsidized roads.

Mr. GEORGE. It is not the proposition, I hope, that these railroad companies shall do work for nothing. Is that the proposition?

Mr. MORGAN. That they shall not do it at all is the proposition of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That they shall not be paid to do it.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course they will not do it if they are not paid for it.

Mr. ALLISON. There is an obligation on the part of the Union and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies to transport troops, munitions of war, and the mails.

Mr. MORGAN. Over the subsidized lines.

Mr. ALLISON. Over the subsidized lines. Now it is proposed to say that the Government will not pay them for transporting over any lines that they influence or control.

Mr. STEWART. But it goes further than that, and it provides "or by the Southern Pacific Company," not the Central Pacific Company, but another company entirely, an independent company, and any road which it operates.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there a proposition to strike something out of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, this provision came from the House.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator read what is proposed to be stricken out?

Mr. STEWART. I will read it. It is as follows:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, including the lines of the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway Company or by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

Mr. MORGAN. The sum of money herein appropriated to which that proviso applies, is the sum of $2,850,000 for the purposes of army transportation, part of which is appropriated for horses, wagons, and what not. Then the Senator from Mississippi will notice that the proviso which the House of Representatives put in and which the Senate committee propose to strike out is—

That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army, etc.

Over these nonsubsidized branch lines of the Union and Central Pacific companies, or any road in the control of the Southern Pacific Company.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to get the facts. As I understand now, the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific companies are debtors of the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. They are.

Mr. GEORGE. To a very considerable amount?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. About $60,000,000, as I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. A large amount, whatever it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Sixty-four million dollars of principal and fifty-odd million dollars of interest.

Mr. GEORGE. They are debtors.

Mr. MORGAN. To the amount of over $115,000,000 altogether.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, I understand these two corporations are debtors. They are separate debtors and not joint debtors, I believe?

Mr. ALLISON. They are separate debtors.

Mr. GEORGE. Each of these two corporations is a debtor, and I suppose each has leased certain lines of railroad?

Mr. STEWART. No; it is the Southern Pacific Company that has leased some lines, and not the Central Pacific.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me. The Union Pacific Railroad Company has got independent charters from different States and Territories through which its main lines run. It has various supply branches of the main trunk line and owns the majority of stock in these branch lines, and where they have bonds the Union Pacific Railroad Company owns a majority of the bonds.

Mr. GEORGE. They are substantially the owners of the branch lines.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course they are. The Central Pacific Railroad has also some similar relations or conditions with the roads that connect with it, not so extensive, however; but this bill seems to relate entirely to the Union Pacific Railroad; that is to say, the part proposed to be stricken out by the Senate committee, what the House put in there, seems to relate entirely to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, including the Oregon Short Line, the Utah Northern Railway Company, and the Southern Pacific Company, over lines embraced in the Pacific system, the Southern Pacific and not the Central Pacific.

Mr. STEWART. The Southern Pacific Company leased the Central Pacific and leased a good many other lines.

Mr. MORGAN. I know it has.

Mr. GEORGE. I was trying to get at the substantial facts as they exist, or in substance, and with this view: If these roads really are substantially owned by these various lines which we do not recognize as our debtors—

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that these two companies are so far substantially the owners of these branch lines that they propose to the Government of the United States to transfer their ownership of stock, bonds, and all, as a condition of security to the Government for the payment of the one hundred and thirteen or one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty million dollars that those two main trunk lines owe the Government. They propose to transfer these securities to the Government of the United States, and the Senate select committee report a bill here favoring the acceptance of the transfer and settlement of that indebtedness by giving them one hundred years of extension at 2 per cent interest, I believe it was, per annum.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Iowa recognize that as a correct statement of facts or is there a dispute about them?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not as familiar with the facts as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I happen to know only some detached facts respecting this subject which I stated before the Senator from Mississippi came in, one of which was that I happen to know that the Union Pacific Railroad Company has leased a line which it did not build.

Mr. GEORGE. The Fort Worth line.

Mr. ALLISON. The Fort Worth line, which company has issued bonds. I do not know but it may be right and it may be lawful for us to segregate earnings that ought to be used and would be used ordinarily to pay interest upon the cost of constructing a railway; I do not know but we ought to divert them and say that we will take whatever earnings we choose to take from this railroad company and put them in our general caldron for the purposes of settlement hereafter between these two great railway companies and the Government. That is the point that influenced me in the decision I came to that it was not wise for us in this way to simply state that no money should be used for this purpose without going farther and regulating, as the Senator by his intimation seems to think we ought, and I think we ought to. If we are going to do this, I think we ought to say that whatever money arises from this transportation shall be put into this pocket of ours and be invested and used for the purpose of ultimately extinguishing, as far as it can extinguish, the debt that these railroad companies owe the United States.

Mr. FRYE. But what right has the United States to take the earnings of all the California roads but one and two-thirds of all the Texas roads and pay the debt of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific companies to the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. I was trying to argue that there was some doubt about that, but I infer from some observations made on my left that there seems to be no doubt about it. If there is none, then I submit that, at least, when we take this money we ought to provide for its disposition.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will try to make it plain to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to make it plain.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator has made plain to me what he said thus far.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will make it plain once more. It is proposed by the Senate committee to strike out of the House bill these words:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by the Union Pacific Railway Company, including the lines of the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway Company or by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

We all understand what that means. The companies have all been named here to which this provision is intended to apply. Now I will go back to the Thurman law, of which the Senator has spoken. He has stated correctly as to the adjustment of this Government debt in the Thurman law and the amendments that were therein made to the law of 1862 and the law of 1864 as to the amount of money that should be held back by the Government on transportation account, what for the sinking fund, and what on account of net earnings. Then we turn to section 9 of the Thurman act, which reads in this wise:

SEC. 9. That all sums due to the United States from any of said companies respectively, whether payable presently or not, and all sums required to be paid to the United States or into the Treasury, or into said sinking fund under this act, or under the acts hereinbefore referred to, or otherwise, are hereby declared to be a lien upon all the property, estate, rights, and franchises of every description granted or conveyed by the United States to any of said companies, respectively or jointly, and also upon all the estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, assets, and income of the said several railroad companies respectively, from whatever source derived, subject to any lawfully prior and paramount mortgage, lien, or claim thereon.

So it appears from that that the lien of the Government was a lien upon their assets, a lien upon their income, a lien upon their property of every kind and character wherever found or whatever it consisted of.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator read the remainder of it?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will read it.

But this section shall not be construed to prevent said companies respectively from using and disposing of any of their property or assets in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of their current business, in good faith and for valuable consideration.

I wish to know if it is in the ordinary, lawful, and proper course of business, of managing and running the Union and Central Pacific Railways, that they should take the assets, the income of these companies, the property of the Government, and proceed to build branch lines all over this country for the purpose of making money for the stockholders of those lines respectively?

It appears in the report made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], I believe—

Mr. ALLISON. Let me answer that question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will allow me to just make one further statement, then he will have two things to answer, and perhaps he will better understand exactly what to answer.

It appears, as I think, in the report made by the Senator from Maine that it was proposed to turn in a large amount of assets of these different branch lines as additional assets which it was claimed the Government did not cover by its present lien upon the property of the company as an inducement to have the debt extended for one hundred years at 3 per cent.

It also appears in the statement made by the commission, which was appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate to investigate the affairs of the Pacific Railroads, that the property, the assets, the securities, of these different lines of railway were to-day in the treasury of the Union and Central Pacific Railway Companies. If they are in the treasury of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, how did they get there, unless it was by advances made by these companies or its officers and agents?

Now, then, whatever was done, after these branch roads were constructed they entered into a contract with both the Central and the Union Pacific Railroad Companies so far as the lines were built by each, by which they were to be entitled to a constructive mileage over the particular part of the line embraced in the branch lines. For instance, a road running 50 or 100 miles into the country from the main line and connecting with the main line was entitled to many times the mileage upon freight and passengers that was charged by the main line itself. This was a contract entered into between the two companies, and the owners of the branch lines, it is alleged, were the parties who were directing and controlling the Pacific Railroad systems.

The Senator from Nevada has raised the question here as to the right and justice of applying this to the Southern Pacific Company. If I understand the history of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at all, it is this: That road was built, and it is owned to-day, by the very men who incorporated and who constructed and still control the Central Pacific Railroad.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is entirely mistaken. Let me state what the facts are.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator can state them after I get through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield a half hour further to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I supposed I was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I supposed the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no. I yielded temporarily to the Senator.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I supposed the Senator vacated the floor, and that I had taken it in my own right.

If there is any one thing better known than another in this country it is that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company have always been, since the construction of the Southern Pacific Railway, really under one management and control.

It has been charged upon this floor repeatedly, and not denied I think as yet, that it has been the practice of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to turn the switches in San Francisco and thus divert the freight from the Central Pacific Railway over on to the Southern Pacific, because if the freight should go over the Central Pacific it would be required to pay a certain revenue to the Government in liquidation of its debts and obligations, and for the further reason that the Southern Pacific would gain in mileage.

Mr. GEORGE. What does the Senator mean by "turning the switches?"

Mr. MCPHERSON. They turn the switches at San Francisco in order that freight, which might naturally go over the Central Pacific, shall go over to the Southern Pacific. They are all connected together; they are all one system; and to-day the Southern Pacific Railroad is the lessee of the Central Pacific system. This fact alone is an all-sufficient reason and justification for all I have said.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator will permit me to make a statement. If a passenger residing near Nebraska City should come down into Missouri and take the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Road, and then go down into Texas, and then go to California in order to get up to the State of Washington, the railroad companies would sell a ticket at the same rate from that country, nearly 1,000 miles north of where they turn west to go to the Pacific, in order to get to the States of Washington and Oregon.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Evidence of what I have said is found in the report made by the Senator from Maine, in which I think he declares that the Central Pacific Railroad Company is worth nothing practically, and can pay nothing to the Government. I will not say that the Senator uses quite such extravagant terms as I have employed, but it amounts to the same thing in the end.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator from New Jersey had read with care the report which I made, I think the statements which he is making would be much more correct than they are now.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think the Senator reported that the income of the company was so small that it was impossible for the Central Pacific Company to pay one and one-half per cent, and it virtually amounts to nothing. Perhaps my expression is a little too extravagant. As I said before, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is owned by a certain number of wealthy gentlemen who had constructed the Central Pacific system and now lease it, and to-day, the Central Pacific Railroad, we are told, is practically bankrupt, the business over that road comparatively light.

Now, I wish to know in distributing the compensation to be given to these railroad companies for transportation over the lines by authority of the Thurman law, what is the propriety and where is the justice, with such a condition of things existing, to pay these aided lines 50 per cent, and then to give to the nonaided branches of their own lines they themselves own full compensation?

By what right, confronted as you are by the Thurman act, when there is no authority given there to alienate one particle of their assets, not one dollar of their income, except in the ordinary transaction of their business, can you now authorize them, or can they assume that they are authorized and take the responsibility of leasing or buying the Oregon Short Line and the Utah Northern, whatever that may do with respect to the credit or the stability or the standing or the security of the lines themselves, or the security which the Government may hold upon these properties? No, sir; not one single dollar of money should be paid by either of these companies to the Southern Pacific, which is to-day the lessee of the Central Pacific, or to the Union Pacific Railroad Company for any of its purchased or leased or built lines, wherever they may be found, either for the transportation of troops or the carrying of the mails.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Jersey seems not to have read the whole of the Thurman act when he speaks of the diversion of the assets of these companies. The Thurman act provided that there should be paid into the Treasury 25 per cent of their net earnings computed in a certain way, which, as I remember it, although I have not looked at the act for years, provided that the net earnings should be all the earnings after paying interest upon the first-mortgage bonds and after paying the ordinary running expenses, and not to include the subsequent mortgage debt. Therefore, 75 per cent of those earnings could be used as the railroad company saw fit to use them, but they would not pay any dividends until they complied with the Thurman act. That is all there is about that.

For myself, I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion of the relations of these railroads as respects the proposed amendment of the committee having that matter in charge or as to what should be finally done respecting our debt due from these companies. But I wanted to say one other thing before I sat down, and that is that the Supreme Court has decided that it is a violation and impairment of a contract for Congress by legislation to take away earnings from portions of railroads that are not subsidized and apply them to any portion of a road that is subsidized. Although that perhaps has not been decided as respects this particular case by the Supreme Court, it has been decided by the Court of Claims unanimously. The decision is to be found in their reports, and upon it the Government of the United States, having appealed to the Supreme Court, withdrew that appeal. Upon a case precisely on all fours with the case here, the Court of Claims unanimously decided that the Government could not withhold payment such as this.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, how does that affect this question? As I understand it, the latter part of the House provision I disagree to, but the first part of it I do most emphatically agree to, and it simply provides an additional mode of collection of an honest debt by the Government of the United States from companies that owe the Government this money, because it is a condition-precedent here that these auxiliary lines or branches shall be owned or controlled or operated by the companies that are indebted to the United States. So the decision alluded to by the Senator from Iowa does not touch this case.

Mr. ALLISON. It does absolutely.

Mr. VEST. Certainly the Supreme Court of the United States never decided (if so I would be obliged to the Senator to cite the decision) that when one of these corporations is indebted to the Government and the indebtedness acknowledged we did not have the right to coerce additional security for its collection, when they decided that the Thurman act was constitutional.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly they never decided that we did not have that right.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course we could not take the earnings of a road over which the debtor companies had no control and apply that to the payment of our debt.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Thurman act, instead of taking 25 per cent of their net earnings we can take the whole of them.

Mr. VEST. I should say so.

Mr. ALLISON. But that is not the question we are arguing here. We are, or at least I am trying to argue as respects railroads that have received no aid from the Government that have other lines which are fully recognized by the Thurman act, because it expressly reserves prior liens, and I say as respects those the court has decided that we can not take this money.

Mr. VEST. Unquestionably.

Mr. ALLISON. And that is all I desire to say. I have not the decisions before me, but I have read them. We are now paying interest upon judgments of a precisely similar character to that which will be secured, in my opinion, if the provision we are now discussing shall become a part of the law.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Iowa mean to assert that instead of paying over the money to these debtor companies, companies that own and control these lines, we can not provide that the amount due for the transportation shall be credited on the final adjustment of the indebtedness between the companies and the Government of the United States?

Mr. STEWART. It is done now. It is in the sinking fund of roads on which the Government has liens.

Mr. VEST. But it is not the question about its going into the sinking fund. Can we not provide now that instead of paying them money out of the Treasury of the United States we shall simply give them a credit on the final adjustment for the amount due them?

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I will ask the Senator—

Mr. VEST. That is the very point of the discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. I know how able a lawyer he is. Suppose there is a line now leased by one of these companies, having been built by another corporation, and a bond of $20,000 or $30,000 a mile has been put upon that line, does the Senator think we could equitably or legally by a statute take money that belongs fairly to the people who paid their money in and constructed the road and apply it to one part and not to the other?

Mr. VEST. I will say emphatically that we would have the right, subject, as a matter of course, to all equitable liens which even the Congress of the United States can not destroy, because it is in the nature of a contract, or ought not to destroy if they had the power; but they have not got it. We would have the right to take the proceeds or the amount of the assets of the auxiliary company or line if it belonged to the debtor company and apply it to this indebtedness.

Mr. ALLISON. So I agree, but that is not the case.

Mr. VEST. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I drew an amendment here which incorporates my idea about how this matter ought to be adjusted. I am unwilling to pay a dollar in money over to these debtor companies until they pay up the amount that ought long since to have been paid to the people of the United States. I shall therefore offer this amendment. After the word "by," in line 25, I move to insert:

Any railway company or corporation which is indebted to the United States by reason of the aid heretofore given by the Government to such company or corporation, but the amount due from the Government for transportation on lines owned, controlled, or operated by said company or corporation shall be credited upon the indebtedness of said company or corporation to the United States.

I give notice of that amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator, if he wants to make the amendment correspond with the decisions of the courts, the decision on the Thurman act expressly decided that that act was constitutional because it provided for a sinking fund which could be used at maturity for the payment of the debt, and this debt not being due—

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course that is a matter of adjustment. The sinking fund is only one mode of coercing the payment of the debt. It is exactly like levying an execution, only it is indirect.

Mr. FRYE. It carries interest.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, but it is a mere matter of adjustment. The principle decided by the Thurman act, which the railroads fought from the beginning at the point of the legal bayonet until coerced into it, was that the Congress of the United States had no right to take one dollar of their assets and apply it upon the payment of their debt without their consent. That was the whole of it, that we could not coerce the payment of it by an act of Congress, and the Supreme Court decided that we could do it by creating a sinking fund, forcing the roads to do it, taking a certain proportion of their earnings and applying it to the debt that was due to us. Now, we are simply doing that same thing here.

Mr. STEWART. Do you take any more than is already taken? Is not all that you propose now already taken by the Government under the arrangement which is going on?

Mr. VEST. We are taking so much—

Mr. STEWART. We are taking all the freight money.

Mr. VEST. We are taking so much, but here this state of the case is now presented to us: These companies have been permitted to construct branch lines, whether rightfully or wrongfully does not touch this question. The United States Government is now estopped from saying anything in regard to the legality of the construction of the branch lines, as I happen to know, because I served once upon a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee that was instructed to inquire into the legality of the construction of the branch lines and into the whole question of the indebtedness of these companies. That subcommittee and the Committee on the Judiciary came to the conclusion that it increased the security of the people of the United States to allow the roads to construct these lines or to lease them and operate them.

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly a correct conclusion.

Mr. VEST. The committee came to the conclusion that instead of diminishing the security for the debt due from these companies it increased it. Therefore I repeat that we are estopped equitably from raising the question as to the legality of the construction of these lines. We have allowed them to go on and be constructed; we never even remonstrated against it; but, having constructed them, now this question arises: With the knowledge that this indebtedness exists from these debtor companies that are operating or controlling or owning, in the language of this provision of the other House, these lines, ought we to pay them money when they owe it? Have we not got just the same right to take the money that comes from these lines and apply it in the nature of a credit upon the indebtedness to us that we had to pass the Thurman law? In my judgment, there is no difference in principle between the two.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. SAWYER. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to have an executive communication taken from the table for reference?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. SAWYER. There is a letter on the table from the Attorney-General, which came in on the 11th of April, in response to resolution of the Senate, January 25, 1892, relative to certain awards in the matter of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement. I ask that it be taken from the table, and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter and document will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It has been printed.

PORTAGE LAKE AND LAKE SUPERIOR CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of April 23, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, together with a copy of a report of Maj. Charles E. L. B. Davis, Corps of Engineers, relative to the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Canal; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I have received the resolution of the Senate of April 23, requesting that, if not incompatible with the public interest, I inform the Senate what steps have been taken towards the securing of an international conference to consider the question of the free coinage of silver at the mints of the nations participating in such conference, or as to the enlarged use of silver in the currency system of said countries, and that I transmit to the Senate any correspondence between the United States and other governments upon the subject, and in response thereto beg respectfully to inform the Senate that in my opinion it would not be compatible with the public interest to lay before the Senate at this time the information requested; but that at the earliest moment, after definite information can properly be given, all the facts and any correspondence that may take place will be submitted to Congress.

It may not be inappropriate, however, to say here that, believing that the full use of silver as a coin metal, upon an agreed ratio, by the great commercial nations of the world would very highly promote the prosperity of all their people, I have not and will not let any favorable opportunity pass for the promotion of that most desirable result, or if free international silver coinage is not presently attainable, then to secure the largest practicable use of that metal.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 26, 1892.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to debate the message. I simply want to say that the President has said he will let no opportunity pass. What we complain of is that this Government has been sitting and waiting for an opportunity to come. We say it is the duty of the Administration to make the opportunity and not wait until it may come.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do desire to debate the message from the President before it goes to a committee. I ask that the message be printed and lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed and lie on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6923) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out the proviso beginning on page 17.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, in regard to the situation of the roads that this provision covers, let us take the Southern Pacific system. It is not the Central. It leases the Central and it leases a good many other roads. It is the general name of a company that has leased and brought under its control a very large system. It operates I do not know how many, but a good many thousand miles of road. It is a notorious fact published in the newspapers. Their bonds are on the market. Take the bonds of the Southern Pacific.

The Southern Pacific was not built with the Central Pacific money, but it was built with money raised on bonds. They are paying no dividends. The constitution of that road, practically from San Francisco to New Orleans, was of great benefit to the Government in the transportation of munitions of war and the Army. We have had along the Southern border the Apaches and a great deal of the expense was incurred by such transportation before the construction of that road. It was impossible to even recover possession of that country or protect the inhabitants until this road was constructed. The Apaches practically had control of the entire southern portion of the country along the Mexican border. This road was built there and it has been very useful for that purpose. The road is paying no dividend. The bondholders have an interest that the road shall not be destroyed. If the Government requires this long line of road to carry mails and munitions of war for nothing, it will certainly affect the interest of private parties.

It may be that the stock of this company, which has not become of value at all, is owned by men who are interested in the stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. Probably that is the case. They were the promoters of this enterprise.

Now, take the Utah Northern road. The bonds of that company, I think, are on the market also. It is bonded, and so is the Oregon Short Line bonded. These roads run through a very poor country and are not very profitable. They are feeders of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads. As the Senator from Missouri said, they thought it would benefit them to have feeders. The feeders, particularly of the Union Pacific, were beneficial to the trunk line of the Union Pacific, but so far as the Southern Pacific system is concerned it was built with money raised by mortgaging the road.

While we may deal, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, with a company that we contracted with, and make it provide a sinking fund for the payment of the debt, and have done that, and it has been sustained by the Supreme Court, that is entirely another question. As to whether the Thurman act takes all from these roads that may be taken, and whether anything further to provide for the payment can be done or not, you have a committee investigating what can be done to secure the Government in the ultimate payment of its debt; but that we can go out and destroy these other corporations and make them do something for nothing is entirely out of the question.

The Supreme Court have met that exact question. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was not here when I read from that portion of the decision which treated upon this subject. I will read it again. It was contended that under the Thurman act and the various acts of Congress, the Central Pacific and Union Pacific being indebted to the Government, it might do just what is proposed to be done by this provision. That was the exact question. The Government withheld compensation for carrying the mails, and I suppose they have got some two or three million dollars of judgments drawing 10 per cent interest now against the Government for failing to make appropriations to carry the mails on these nonaided roads. The Supreme Court say, with regard to that:

There is another view of this controversy which seems to us conclusive. As the contract between the United States and the railroad company contained in the acts of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, has been interpreted by this court to authorize the retention by the Government of compensation for services only on those roads which the United States aided in building, the construction which the appellants seek to put on the second section of the act of May 8, 1878, would not only render that section a breach of faith on the part of the United States but an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellee. We are bound, if possible, so to construe the law as to lay it open to neither of these objections.

Then the court go on, and after citing the various cases where this question has been decided, say:

Broughton vs. Pensacola, 93 U. S., 256 Red Rock vs. Henry, 103 U. S., 596; Hobbs vs. McLean, 117 U. S., 567, decided at the present term, and cases there cited; United vs. Cocumbs, 12 Pet. 72. The construction contended for by the appellee preserves the good faith of the Government, and frees the act from the imputation of impairing rights secured by the Constitution of the United States.

To take it from these roads, the court say, would be an invasion of their constitutional rights. This very question was before the Supreme Court. It has been before the Court of Claims. It was always decided that you have no power to do it, and if you attempt to do it in this way by legislation on an appropriation bill it seems to be going out of the way.

If further legislation is to be had with regard to the sinking fund it should be done in a separate bill. I hope the select committee will bring in a bill that will provide for security to the Government and will secure the ultimate payment of this indebtedness on reasonable terms, so that the Government shall be secured and the people at large shall be secured and that the railroads and the good faith of the Government shall be preserved. I believe if the committee brought in a bill it would be entirely satisfactory. They reported one in the last Congress, and I presume will report a similar one after further consideration in this Congress. That would be dealing with a subject that they have under their special control, but we should not go outside on this appropriation bill. These roads have been built with bonds that have been floated on the market. It would be a blow at the good faith of the United States and would be regarded by the bond holders as repudiation.

Suppose we should now cripple some of the railroads and they should go into liquidation. The bonds are held all over the world. The roads have been constructed under the laws of the various States. Congress has sanctioned them. The committee reported that their construction was beneficial to the main roads and nobody objected to it. Their bonds, I say, are in the hands of innocent parties, and if we say that they should carry the mails and transport munitions of war and troops of the Government without compensation we do not know to what extent it may cripple them. It may drive some of the weaker roads into bankruptcy. It will very likely do that and do what the Supreme Court of the United States say is an invasion of their constitutional rights. We do not want to be placed in such a position as that on an appropriation bill.

It seems to me this is wild legislation on an appropriation bill and that it has no place here. If we are going to put such measures as this upon our appropriation bills we shall not get them through. If this precedent is set all our appropriation bills will be loaded with legislation, and this session of Congress will not close until next September if we undertake to remedy all the evils in the world and settle everything on appropriation bills, without any report from a committee stating facts upon which to predicate this legislation and with no investigation.

It appears to me that this is going clear outside of any ordinary legislation ever proposed before. If further legislation is necessary our committee will undoubtedly report it and secure the Government payment for the liens it has, and if anybody is bound to contribute, let them contribute. Let that be found out; but to attack all these roads would be unjust. There is one road in Texas that was built and run there for many years. It runs to New Orleans. That road is in this system. It was built before they leased it; somebody bought it or leased it, but not the Central Pacific. If any company bought it, it was the Southern Pacific, and it is operated to the city of New Orleans. I do not know how many stockholders are in it or who are going to be affected by such a provision. What right have you to make that road carry your mails and your munitions of war for nothing?

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, in order that I may make my statement exactly correct so far as my controversy with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is concerned, I wish now to say that I had actually overestimated the Senator's value placed upon the Central Pacific Railroad property to the Government. In a bill which he introduced in the Senate December 14, 1891, which I suppose represents his deliberate and well matured judgment with respect to what the Union or the Central Pacific Railroad should pay to the Government, I find on page 17 that there shall be a computation made of the amount of debt, principal and interest, due from the Central Pacific Railroad to the Government and that bonds should be issued; that said bonds shall bear interest for ten years at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, and after 1902 they shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum. I think I stated that the Senator's recommendation in his report was 1½ per cent or 1¼ per cent, I did not remember which, but I find it was only 1 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, that is the value which the Senator from Maine, after a very careful and exhaustive examination into the whole matter, as is evidenced in his report made one year earlier, placed upon the Central Pacific Railroad property. That property is now leased by the Southern Pacific Railroad and pays nothing on net earnings to the Government. Therefore I say that as to that combination it is worse than a combination in which one party leases to itself a property in which the Government upon its earnings is entitled to a lien, and the rental is made so low that by no possibility can the Government receive any part of the net earnings, as provided by the Thurman law, does not seem to honest people quite fair.

Now, for a single moment let us investigate the other subject, with regard to the branch lines of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

I find in the report made by the Senator from Maine, February 17, 1890, in which he gives a statement of the number and names of the branch lines of railroad that have been constructed by the Union Pacific Railroad Company. He gives also the bonded debt of those roads, the amount of the bonds that are held by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the amount of stock of said roads, and the amount held by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

I need not enumerate the roads, but I find here from his statement that out of the entire bonded debt, amounting to something like fifty-two or fifty-three million dollars, the Union Pacific Railroad Company holds a majority of the bonds, and with the exception of the Oregon Short Line, the Utah Northern, the Utah Southern, and Utah and Southern Extension, and the Union Pacific, Lincoln and Colorado Railway, some three or four roads which have been a recent acquisition by the Union Pacific Company, the general public own but a small part of these bonds.

I suppose two or three million would cover all the bonds held outside of these recently acquired roads. There is in the treasury of the Union Pacific Railroad Company $26,717,000 in bonds of the branch lines. They are some fifteen or twenty in number. In mileage they make something like 3,339 miles.

Now, we turn to the stock debt of these roads. We find that the general public owns no part of its capital stock except upon the lines of recent acquisition, of which I have already spoken, which securities were already in the hands of the public before the Union Pacific Railway Company became the owner or lessee of the property. We find that there are $37,000,000 of stock debt, most of which is to-day in the treasury of the Union Pacific Railway Company, which it proposes to turn over to the Government as additional security, provided the Government will consent that their bonded debt may be extended for fifty years or one hundred years, whatever the plan of settlement now is; I confess I do not know. There have been so many bills reported here that I can not really tell how the committee now stand, but I know that it is a long extension of time on their bonded debt due the Government.

And what more does it imply? That the rate of interest which is now 6 per cent upon the bonds, shall be reduced in consideration of their agreeing to pay anything at all to a 3 per cent rate. Three per cent is the annual burden of interest which the Union Pacific Railway Company is to bear as compared with its rival lines, all of whom have been compelled to pay 5 or 6 per cent interest upon their bonds. They ask the Government to reduce their rate of interest to 3 per cent in consideration that they will consent to pay any part of the debt which they are obligated to pay to the Government. That is exactly the condition of this whole affair.

Mr. STEWART. But the principal rival line has received a larger subsidy in fact than all of them together. The Northern Pacific has received more than all the rest combined.

Mr. McPHERSON. I know nothing about that. We are not discussing the Northern Pacific at all. So far as the Northern Pacific is concerned I know nothing. I do not think this discussion has much to do with that road. The Northern Pacific is not mentioned here, nor do I suppose it has any controversy with the Government with regard to the transportation of munitions of war, or soldiers, or the mails, otherwise it would have appeared in the House bill with these other suspects.

Mr. STEWART. It is one of the rival lines.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That may all be, but there are four or five rival lines of railroad running from Chicago towards that western country. They have almost reached the easterly end of the Central Pacific Railroad. Some of these lines would be willing to-day to pay the Government every dollar of the Government mortgage upon that property if they could be possessed of that property and make a through line to the Pacific Ocean. It was the original intention of the legislation when it was made by Congress that the Union and Central Pacific Railroads should act as one line and should form a continuous line of communication between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, but ever since those two lines were built there has been a rivalry. There has been no unity of feeling and no unity of action between them, and to-day the Central Pacific property has been alienated away from Government control to such an extent that the Government can not hope to receive the full revenue the Thurman law required and reasonably expected.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes; all that is required under the lease.

Mr. MCPHERSON. All that it is entitled to under the lease, and what was the lease? The compensation paid for the use of that road is but a small part of its earning power if to-day managed by the Rock Island or Northwestern or any of these great lines of railroad which have reached almost its easterly end from this side of the Mississippi River.

Mr. FRYE. Is the Senator stating from knowledge or guess?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I state it upon the authority of officers and men who were the owners and the managers of those properties.

Mr. FRYE. What does the Senator mean? That there are people ready to purchase the branch of the Central Pacific over which the Government has a lien?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Government has now no lien upon the branches. But as to the main line, I do state precisely that fact.

Mr. FRYE. And pay the first mortgage and the Government's lien, too?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, I have stated that fact. I did not say that they will be willing to pay the back interest, but I mean to say they will be willing to pay all the bonds, the prior mortgage, and the Government mortgage, which would be infinitely better for the Government than the plan proposed as a settlement.

Mr. FRYE. But, if the Senator will allow me, the settlement which the Committee on Pacific Railroads proposed that the Central Pacific should make insured to the Government of the United States its entire debt, and protected it by all the property that the Central Pacific had, not only the line over which the United States has a lien but all other lines which it owns, all of its terminals in San Francisco and everywhere else; and in addition to that an assignment of the Southern Pacific lease, with a guaranty for the payment of the entire income of the lease to the United States Government.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Maine knows perfectly well that the Central Pacific does not reach San Francisco. There is another line of railroad. The terminal is not one that belongs to the Central Pacific system proper.

Mr. FRYE. The Central Pacific Railroad, over which the Government has a lien, does not commence anywhere or end anywhere, but with the connections over which it has control and which it could give to the Government it does have terminals.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well. Now, I say that the Central Pacific Railroad to-day can be sold to other railroad corporations for the entire bonded debt of the Government, less the interest, and also securing the payment of the original twenty-five million of first-mortgage bonds.

Mr. FRYE. Less the interest?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not know. As the Senator says, the road begins nowhere and ends nowhere. It certainly begins at Ogden and connects with the Union Pacific Railroad at this end.

Mr. FRYE. Less the interest, the Senator says. The interest is as much as the debt. Why should we lose the interest?

Mr. MCPHERSON. You propose to compute debt and interest and exact only 1 per cent. You had better lose the interest now rather than grant this new subsidy and lose all in the end.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; there is 1 per cent for ten years and that is all. The balance of the time it is 2 per cent. And the committee has not reported a bill at this session of Congress. The Central Pacific was in a condition where, in the judgment of the committee unless there was a settlement made before the debt became due, the United States never would receive one single dollar of debt or interest, and that is my judgment now, unless there is a settlement.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suppose the Government's only method of relief will be that when the time comes and the bonds fall due, to liquidate the whole concern. The road must necessarily be sold or the Government must undertake either to lease it or to run it. I do not know what decision the Government will reach in respect to that matter. If offered for sale in the market, in my judgment it will bring a great deal higher price than the value at present placed upon it by the committee.

Mr. FRYE. It will bring nothing offered for sale if at either end of the road there is no possibility of the purchasing road making her connection, and there is none now, unless it can buy all these other roads.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It will be very easy for those four lines of railroad of which I have spoken to reach Ogden. Some of them have already reached it. One of them in particular has already reached Ogden, and the others may be able to do it. When that is done I see no reason whatever why they can not run their cars off on the Central Pacific track. As to the Pacific end of the line, I assume the new purchasers would find themselves blocked out as the Government now is.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, in reference to the question whether the people of the United States shall pay to these unbonded and unaided corporations connected with this system a higher rate than they pay the roads which have been subsidized and aided, I still adhere to the opinion that the House provision is the proper one. I see nothing in neither decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which in any way contravenes the reasoning upon which that conclusion rests. The proposition is that certain persons who are intrusted with official position in the management of a great public interest and which was subjected to certain equities and payable to the people of the United States for the repayment of money, have appropriated to their own use through the medium of corporations the funds which should have been properly reserved and invested and applied for the payment of this obligation to the United States. They have taken the public money in the guise of a corporation and have applied it to their own personal use and benefit.

It is contended that there is no power anywhere in this Government to seek redress. The Supreme Court has decided upon the technical question of a separate corporation and in reference to the specific force and effect of the statutes that have been passed, that under the provisions of the statutes and in the manner in which the suit was brought no relief could be had, but in the first case in which this question came up, which was cited by the Senator from Nevada, the court said:

In short, it may be taken for granted that if these allegations are true, as they must be held to be on demurrer, frauds more unmitigated than those set forth in this bill were never perpetrated on a helpless corporation by its managing directors.

That is in the case of the United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company decided in 1878, and in that case the Supreme Court further say in giving their opinion:

We are not prepared to say that there are no trusts which the United States may not enforce in a court of equity against this company. When such a trust is shown it will be time enough to recognize it. But we are of opinion that there is none set forth in this bill which, under the statute authorizing the present suit, can be enforced in the circuit court.

So the ground upon which the court rendered its opinion in that case was certainly the specific terms of the statute, and it did not agree that there was no equity and no trust which could be enforced against the property in which this money of the corporation was invested for the benefit of these parties.

So in a case which was brought up in the Supreme Court in reference to the appropriation for the payment for transportation of the mails the opinion of the court in that case rests entirely upon the force and effect of the terms of the statute which was passed, but if the court had affirmed that the money of the United States could by a conspiracy be fraudulently taken and appropriated for the benefit of these individuals it certainly would be improper for a new case to be made and presented to that court for a new consideration of the subject.

This provision of the other House simply provides that this money shall not be now appropriated and paid, leaving these questions for future action and future consideration. So there is nothing in the decision of the court in the case of the Post-Office Department nor in this previous decision of the United States vs. the Union Pacific Railroad Company and others, which deprives the Government or the people of the United States of the opportunity of bringing this question before the court in the shape of some other bill, and in some statute make a different provision for the suit.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] cited me to the decision of the Court of Claims in the case of The Central Pacific Railroad vs. The United States. After examining it I have not the slightest doubt that the Senator from Florida has correctly stated this legal proposition. I will simply read from the syllabus of that case:

Where a road was not aided by the Government, the Government is not authorized by the Thurman act (30 Stat. L., 55) to withhold compensation. The rule for the construction of the act stated and the decisions relating to the Pacific railroad system reviewed.

That case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision of the Court of Claims was affirmed; in other words, the Supreme Court simply said that the Court of Claims was correct in its opinion that the contract upon which the Thurman act was based did not include the nonsubsidized roads.

Mr. STEWART. It ought to be stated further that in the opinion the court said to give it that construction would be bad faith and infringing their constitutional rights.

Mr. VEST. Unquestionably, because they were confining their opinion to the contract on which the Thurman act was based. I agree with the Supreme Court most emphatically. The Supreme Court was certainly right in delivering that opinion, and it would have been bad faith under the Thurman act; but, as I said to the Senator from Iowa, I should like to find any decision of the Supreme Court which says that we as creditors have not the right to take the assets or to put our lien, if you may so express it, upon the assets of a debtor corporation outside of the Thurman act.

Mr. STEWART. Did not the Supreme Court in that very case say that the language of the Thurman act, that construction, if it meant what it was claimed it did; in other words, if it meant that the Government could withhold the compensation for mail service from these roads, it would be in bad faith and would be in violation of the constitutional rights of the roads, and that was one of the reasons why they gave it the other construction, that it would be unconstitutional to construe it that way; that it would be taking property without due process of law?

Mr. VEST. Of course the Supreme Court of the United States very properly said that, while there was no inhibition on the Congress of the United States as to impairing the obligation of a contract still that Congress did not have a right to take the property of any person or corporation for any purpose without due process of law or in violation of a contract. The Senator overlooks the fact that both those decisions were based upon a construction of the Thurman act. Now it is proposed here to make a new law. It is true it is in an appropriation bill, but it is germane to the appropriation bill because it is in regard to an appropriation which is proposed now to pay to these debtor companies certain amounts of money in cash payments.

The other House very properly said, in my judgment, "no, we will not pay these corporations this money because they are indebted to the people of the United States, and that amount of indebtedness shall be credited upon them." While the other House does not say that, as a matter of course I assume that they so meant it, and in the amendment which I have drawn I have put that in express terms. Instead of paying them the money let us give them a credit for the amount which is due them for carrying munitions of war or mails upon the sum found to be due upon a final adjustment to the Government of the United States, and that is all. If the Supreme Court ever made the decision that we did not have a right to pass such a bill, I should like to see it.

Mr. STEWART. I will show it to the Senator right here.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that in the case I quoted the court in express terms say that they will not decide that.

Mr. STEWART. I will show this—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. CALL. I simply—

Mr. STEWART. Allow me one moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. In a moment. I do not deny what the Senator from Nevada has said as to the construction of the Thurman act. I admit that that contract or that act did not cover these cases of nonsubsidized branches, but the point between us now is whether Congress has a right to pass this original act.

Mr. STEWART. That is exactly the point, and I want to call the Senator's attention to what the Supreme Court have decided. They have decided that if the Thurman act was such an act as you now propose to pass it would be in bad faith, in contravention of constitutional rights. That is what they decided. They first argued the Thurman act on its language and contended that it did not fairly cover this on its language, but they said if its language did cover it, if it took away the compensation due the nonaided roads, then it would be in contravention of constitutional rights. That is one of the reasons they assign for not giving it that construction. They say there is another view independent of the language of the law that is persuasive.

There is another view of this controversy which seems to us conclusive.

What is that other view that is conclusive?

As the contract between the United States and the railroad company contained in the acts of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, has been interpreted by this court to authorize the retention by the Government of compensation for services only on those roads which the United States aided in building, the construction which the appellants—seek to put on the second section of the act of May 8, 1878, would not only render that section a breach of faith on the part of the United States, but an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellee.

Then the court say if the language of the act did include these non-aided roads and withhold from them compensation, and it could be so construed, it would not only be a breach of faith, but it would be an invasion of their constitutional rights. Now, the Senator says we will pass an act that does include that, and the Supreme Court say such an act would be in bad faith and an invasion of their constitutional rights.

Mr. VEST. Under that contract.

Mr. STEWART. Under any contract.

Mr. VEST. Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART. There is no other contract but that contract. The only claim that we have upon the Union or Central Pacific Railroad grows out of those two contracts. It is by contract, the contract by which the Government aided them in the construction of the roads. The complaint is that they have made a great deal of money, and it has been suggested that they have not complied with the contracts, but it was in reference to these contracts. We have no other contract or no other claim. Our claim rests upon the contract made with them in aid of the construction. That contract does not include these other roads built with bonds that were distributed and sold all over the country, and if we have any respect for public faith we will not interfere with those bonds.

I say that the Supreme Court have decided the exact question. First, they say the Thurman act does not provide for retaining the compensation from these nonaided roads, but if it did it would be unconstitutional; and that is an additional reason for not giving it that construction. Now, it is proposed to pass such a law as the court denounce as unconstitutional. That is the proposition here. It is nothing short of that.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I simply wish to give for the information of the Senate the language of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company. The court say:

We are not prepared to say that there are no trusts which the United States may not enforce in a court of equity against this company. When such a trust is shown, it will be time enough to recognize it.

That clearly answers the proposition of the Senator from Nevada. A contract is one thing; the right of a creditor to pursue a fund misappropriated is another; and the Supreme Court in doing this doubtless had no intention to say, as the Senator from Missouri construes it, that this fund is properly subject to the lien of the people of the United States, that it could not be followed when it was invested contrary to the provisions of law for the benefit of these individual creditors.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but a very short time. It occurs to me, after listening to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], that the relations between these roads and the branches, as the other roads are termed, are not understood by the Senate or by the country. It seems to me very clear, however, that those who have invested their money in the branch roads have entrusted the management of the branch roads to the principal corporations upon terms that are altogether private. It seems to me no occasion can be better than this for saying to all the parties in interest that no money shall be paid for army transportation under this bill to any of them or to the principal corporations, so that if it is unjust to any particular road they can easily furnish to the country or to the Senate such explanation as will show that it is unjust.

The relations are now secret. No Senator will venture to state to the Senate what are the exact arrangements under which these roads are controlled by the Union Pacific or the Southern Pacific. It is perfectly certain that they will never disclose the particulars of these arrangements until they are compelled to do so. The United States is interested in all that concerns these railroads and their manner of operation.

The Senator from New Jersey says that there is a combination existing between the managers of these various roads by which the United States is to be plundered, by which its interests are to be sacrificed, and that all these arrangements are made by persons interested in these properties. If this were a transaction in which we were sitting as judges we would say, "Inasmuch as you have so made these rights as that parties in interest can not understand it and have furnished no explanation to the parties in interest, something must be done to compel it." The most simple method would be to say to them, "This money is due the United States, and, more than that, good faith is due the United States in the management of these roads."

The Senator's suggestion is, according to the facts of the case, that arrangements are made by which one of these roads is not to be allowed to earn anything, but that all the earnings are to seem to belong to another corporation. Are we to continue to pay them for their services? The money goes out of the Treasury; no explanation is demanded, or if an explanation is demanded, they say, "We will furnish no explanation." Is it not wise policy to say, "These services shall be performed, and they will be paid for properly when you furnish some clear explanation of your expenditure?"

If we were acting for ourselves, with the power which I conceive we possess, we would say, "Here you complain that your rights are likely to be invaded or disregarded; furnish such a clear explanation of your rights as will enable us to do justice to you. You have consented that your property shall be thus confused." It is, perhaps, a part of the policy of the companies to confuse these various interests so as to prevent detection or prevent an ascertainment of the actual state of affairs. The Senator from Nevada tells us it is so exactly, that we must wait until we get more facts. I say keep the money, and let these men furnish the facts to show how the Government can do justice. At present justice is not done to the people of the United States. That seems to be admitted on all hands, and that is a clear proposition.

It is said, however, we may possibly do wrong to somebody else. Let that somebody else who is likely to be wronged furnish the facts, so they can be protected. At present, I repeat what I said before, they have allowed their property to be mixed and confused among various corporations, taking charge of them and running them. That modern system of fraudulent conveyance by means of corporations seems to have applied here with wonderful success. So we are confused now.

The Senator from Nevada speaks of it as being a condition that compels the United States to submit to this injustice on the part of the Government lest we do injustice to somebody else; that somebody else being a party to this scheme by which their rights are confounded with the rights of other people, I would retain the money and await explanation. If there is any innocent person likely so suffer, it is easy for that innocent person to furnish such explanation of his rights as will enable us to see where the right is and do that which is just.

We can not do it now; we are certain to do an injustice to the interests of the public, and we can only be saved from injustice to individuals by those individuals taking the pains to show what their rights are, to separate themselves from these fraudulent parties, present their interests distinctly so we can comprehend them, and when these interests are so stated, so separated that we can comprehend them, the Congress of the United States will have the means of being just. We can not now on account of the conditions of the parties whose rights are supposed to be involved. Let the innocent separate their interests and rights from those who are not innocent, and then we can protect them.

Mr. MORGAN. If the time should ever arrive when we are compelled—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I was about making a motion to adjourn if it is agreeable to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection. I wish merely to say one thing, however, before adjournment, and that is if the time shall ever arrive when the Congress of the United States finds itself compelled to legislate upon suspicion in raising revenue or in disbursing revenue either, I am congratulating myself, and I think I can the Senate, that that time is not here now. We have facts ascertained by a committee of this body which are unquestionable, I think, which do disclose the exact relation between all these branch roads and the main trunk lines of the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific railroads.

If the Senator from Arkansas desires to make a motion to adjourn I will now yield to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 27, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

PERSECUTION OF JEWS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the permission heretofore given, I wish to file the views of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the resolution relative to the persecution of Russian Hebrews in Russia, which report I ask to have printed. I also ask unanimous consent that the majority and minority reports upon this resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] submits the views of the minority on the resolution relative to the persecution of Russian Hebrews, and also asks unanimous consent that the views of the majority and minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on that subject be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The majority report is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 8) expressing sympathy with the Russian Hebrews in their distress, have carefully considered the same, and report the said joint resolution and recommend that it do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out the word "late," in line 9, and insert in said line, before the word "decrees," "laws and," and add to the joint resolution the following words: "And the President is requested to use his good offices to induce the Government of Russia to mitigate the said laws and decrees."

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submit the following minority views upon the resolutions of sympathy for the Russian Hebrews reported by the majority of the committee:

They are opposed to the adoption of these resolutions, and they believe that the passage of the same by Congress, in view of the condition of affairs that now exists in Russia in reference to these persecutions, would be a reflection upon the good sense and feelings of the American people, instead of an expression of their views upon this subject, and they assign the following reasons in support of their objections.

First. The Russian Hebrews, constituting 5,000,000 of people, the selected victims of religious intolerance, do not require any further expression of sympathy from the civilized world. They have had sympathy from every quarter of the globe, and it is impractical and utterly useless to announce that we simply send them our condolence in their affliction when we have the means of affording them practical relief. It means that we will do nothing else, and we believe that public opinion is opposed to trifling with this question in this manner. No one supposes for a moment that we are not in sympathy with them, and it is wasting our time upon a sentiment that is so strong among the people that it requires no confirmation and needs no encouragement at the hands of Congress.

Second. We have it within our power without in the slightest manner offending the Government of Russia, by the intervention of the good offices of this Government, to be of great practical service to this afflicted race who are looking to us for some friendly intercession in their behalf. The resolutions offered by Mr. RAYNER in the early part of the session, and which with some slight amendments are herewith incorporated and made part of this report, and which, when the matter comes up in the House, will be offered as a substitute for the resolutions of the committee, seem to strike at the root of this subject. They are in strict accordance with the precedents of international usage and they are sustained by numerous authorities in the Department of State. They call in a most respectful manner for an inquiry as to whether the Russian Government intends to repeal the obnoxious laws that sanction these persecutions, and which were held out to the world as temporary when they were passed.

It is the opinion of the minority of this committee, in view of the friendly intercourse between the two governments, that the Russian authorities will answer this communication in the same respectful manner that it is conveyed to them, and we will then discover whether this code of religious tyranny will be continued or modified. We believe that upon the demand that is made by this Government, in which it is confidently expected that other Governments will unite, that the Russian Government will change the severity of this system. If it does not however do so then we will at least know it and realize that the thousands of immigrants who are coming to our shores are driven here under an edict that has no counterpart now among any civilized people.

We can then find out whether this is not a violation of the Russian treaty, as the President thinks it is, and we can then call the attention of the Russian Government to this fact and of the obligation that devolves upon it not to flood this country with the victims of its oppression, but to permit them to live in the dominion in which they were born according to that natural code of justice and freedom that prevails now in every other country with which we are upon terms of amity and friendship.

In conclusion, the undersigned desire to state that if the majority of the committee will only see fit, when their resolutions come before the House, to accompany them with some resolutions of inquiry substantially similar to those offered by Mr. RAYNER, then the minority of the committee will be only too glad to unite with them in the expressions of sympathy that they propose.

ISIDOR RAYNER,
THOMAS J. GEARY,
A. C. HARMER,
JAMES O'DONNELL.

Amended resolutions protesting against the treatment of the Russian Hebrews by the Government of Russia, and inquiring into the causes of their continued persecution.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time has arrived when the Government of the United States is entitled to take an interest in regard to the continued persecution of the Hebrews in the Empire of Russia; that this duty devolves upon it because vast numbers of this afflicted people, driven from their homes in Russia by the policy that has there been pursued against them, are continually seeking refuge upon our shores, and claiming from us upon broad grounds of humanity and public comity, that protection which has been denied them at the threshold of almost every other port which they have reached in their wanderings from place to place in search of shelter and of freedom.

Resolved, That while we appreciate the fact that we have no right to interfere in the treatment of its own subject by a foreign government, we also know that the laws and ordinances in question are not directed against the citizens of Russia, but that they have been specifically enacted to operate against the Hebrew population of the Empire, and that in a case of this sort modern precedents and customs sanction the right of the citizens of other governments through the intervention of their good offices to concern themselves about the welfare of their fellow-man whenever, without any fault upon his part, he has been made the victim of oppression.

Resolved, That in view of this condition of affairs, and with a full regard for the kind feeling and the friendly intercourse that exist between this Government and the Government of Russia, that the American minister at the Court of St. Petersburg be instructed to respectfully communicate with the proper authorities and representatives of the Government of Russia and obtain whatever information it is possible for him to procure upon the following points:

First. Whether there is a prospect, in accordance with the repeated assurances and promises that have been given to this effect, of repealing the temporary laws, known as May laws, passed by the committee of ministers, and to which Imperial assent was given on the 3d day of May, 1882.

Second. Whether there is a prospect of replacing the laws which prohibit Jews (subject to certain exceptions) from residing or settling anywhere in Russia, except within the provinces known as the pale of permanent Jewish settlement.

Third. Whether it is proposed to repeal the restrictions that prohibit them from following the vocations and engaging in the same pursuits as all other citizens of Russia have the privilege of doing, and whether the penalty of banishment and expulsion to which they are now subjected is to be withdrawn or modified.

Fourth. Whether the law of Russian passports that prohibits foreign Jews from transacting business in Russia except by permission of the ministers of finance of the interior is to be continued to be enforced.

And be it further resolved, That all information upon these subjects be returned by the American minister to the Secretary of State, who shall remit the same to Congress for such action as it may deem proper to take in the premises, and that when said return is made that the Secretary of State procure and accompany therewith from the Attorney-General of the United States an opinion as to whether the Russian statutes and ordinances, relating to banishment or expulsion for the offenses herein referred to, and to the rights of foreigners traveling in the dominion of Russia, are not a violation of the treaties existing between Russia and the United States.

And be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Secretary of State with the request that he send the same to the American minister at St. Petersburg, and that said minister present the same to his Imperial Majesty the Czar of Russia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. DOLPH, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BUTLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. 7718) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes. In this connection I ask unanimous consent that the House consider these amendments as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it nonconcur in the Senate amendments in gross. Also, that a conference be asked of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. There are eighteen amendments to the bill, not increasing the bill as it passed the House more than seventy-five or eighty thousand dollars; but the committee think the amendments ought to be nonconcurring in for the purpose of throwing the bill into conference.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7818) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments in this bill, and to ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Texas should explain the differences between the Senate and the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. They are minor matters, of no consequence.

Mr. REED. I will withdraw the request.

There being no objection, it was so ordered; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SAYERS, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. DINGLEY.

LYDIA A. MAGILL.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2401) for the relief of Lydia A. Magill, administratrix.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Lydia A. Magill, administratrix of the estate of John C. Magill, deceased, late of Cass County, Mo., the sum of $3,704.25, in full settlement of balance due said Magill for beef furnished under a contract dated May 3, 1862, by said Magill with Capt. W. C. Talkington, commissary of subsistence for Gen. James Shields's division of the United States Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 3.

Mr. BAILEY. No quorum.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw this bill if there is any objection, because I would like to go on with the diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] will please take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 169.

Mr. BAILEY. A quorum having voted, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 169, noes none. So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. TARSNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOSEPH WACKERLY.

Mr. WEADOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4833) to correct the military record of Joseph Wackerly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct and amend the record of Joseph Wackerly, late a private in Company K, Twenty-fourth Regiment Ohio Infantry, by causing the charge of desertion to be removed therefrom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to hear the report read.

Mr. BLOUNT. If this bill is likely to cause debate, I must call for the regular order. Appeals are coming from every direction. If the gentleman can insure the House that it will take only a moment, I do not desire to stand in the way of the passage of the bill; but the bill just passed consumed considerable time.

Mr. WEADOCK. If it will lead to any discussion I will withdraw the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia demand the regular order?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not object just now, Mr. Speaker.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4833) to correct the record of Joseph Wackerly, report:

The military record furnished the committee shows that the said Joseph Wackerly was enrolled as a private in Company K, Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, June 13, 1861, that the muster roll for March and April, 1862, reporting him "missing in battle, April 7, 1862, Pittsburg Landing, has not been heard of since; supposed to be dead." Later rolls have the following remarks opposite his name: "Ordered to be reported deserted, by General Orders, No. 77, August 18, 1862."

The prisoners of war records report him captured at Shiloh, Tenn., April 6, 1862; paroled at Montgomery, May 22, 1862, and deserted from Camp Wallace September 10, 1862. Other records show him received at Columbus, August 7, 1862, and sent to Camp Chase, date not stated. The records further show that he was enrolled as a private in Company H, Twelfth Ohio Volunteers, October 16, 1863, and served faithfully with his company until November 14, 1865, at Nashville, Tenn., when he was mustered out with his company, receiving an honorable discharge seven months after the war closed. The facts appear to be that, after having been taken prisoner, he was paroled, furloughed, and went to Nashville, Tenn.; then to Walhonding, Ohio, 35 miles from the railroad station; that he could not report as soon as ordered, but went at once and reported to provost-marshal at Columbus, Ohio, where he was marked as a deserter and sent to a military prison; that he used every means in his power to get back to his regiment; that he escaped from the bull pen and enlisted as rected above, and served faithfully until the close of the war.

The committee believe this is a meritorious case; that the soldier ought not to have been marked as a deserter; that this bill ought to pass, and recommend that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEADOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JULIUS C. ZANONE.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2100) for the relief of Julius C. Zanone, only heir of John B. Zanone, late of Mound City, in Pulaski County, Ill., deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Julius C. Zanone, only heir of John B. Zanone, deceased, late of Mound City, in the county of Pulaski, and State of Illinois, the sum of $4,525, as and for the rental value of certain buildings in said Mound City, Ill., from April 20, A. D. 1864, to April 30, A. D. 1869, said buildings having been used and occupied by the United States Government as a marine barracks, etc., for and during said period, and which buildings were, during the time the same were so held, used, and occupied by said Government, the property of the said John B. Zanone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear the report read or an explanation.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The report is very short, and explains the bill.

The report was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2100) for the relief of Julius C. Zanone, only heir of John B. Zanone, late of Mound City, in Pulaski County, Ill., having given the same careful consideration, report as follows, viz:

That from the evidence presented to your committee and on file in this case it is shown and proven that John B. Zanone, deceased, was before, during, and for years after the war of the rebellion a resident of Mound City, in Pulaski County, Ill.; that he was loyal to the Government of the United States during all of said war; that he owned at one time a large two-story frame house, situate in said Mound City, Ill., which said house was taken possession of by the forces of the United States Government and by said Government held, used, and occupied for a marine barracks from April 20, 1864, to April 30, 1869; that during said time said house and premises were reasonably worth the sum of $75 per month for the rental thereof; that said John B. Zanone was not during his life, nor has his legal heir since his death, been paid any sum or amount whatever for the use of such property; that the records of the Navy Department show that the Government, after using said building as aforesaid, did offer to said John B. Zanone the sum of $75 per month as rental for said building during the time it was so held, used, and occupied by the Government authorities.

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 28, 1890.

"SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of Mr. Peter Saup, and its inclosure, referred to this Department by you for information as to the status of the claim therein mentioned.

"The letter of Mr. Saup relates to a claim of the estate of John B. Zanone, deceased, for rent of certain buildings at Mound City, Ill., which were occupied as a marine barracks from the 20th of April, 1864, to the 30th of April, 1869.

"It appears from the records of the Department that the sum of $75 per month as rent for said buildings was tendered to Mr. Zanone and was refused by him, but the records do not show what sum or sums of money were paid to him on account of the occupation of the buildings.

"There being no appropriation available from which the amount, if any, to which the claimant may be entitled could be paid, the claim is one requiring consideration and action by Congress.

"Very respectfully,

"F. M. RAMSAY.

"Acting Secretary of the Navy.

"Hon. GEORGE W. SMITH.
"House of Representatives."

That said Zanone would not accept same, claiming that he was entitled to more, but did not relinquish his claim; that said John B. Zanone had a wife, from whom he was divorced on the 14th day of October, A. D. 1884; that said John B. Zanone died in said Pulaski County, Ill., on or about October 27, A. D. 1887, leaving as his only legal heir Julius C. Zanone, who is still living and has attained his majority.

Your committee, being fully satisfied from the evidence that the property aforesaid was the property of said John B. Zanone during the time it was so occupied by the United States Government, as stated in said bill, and that the reasonable rental value thereof was the sum of $75 per month, and that no part thereof has been paid, and that in justice and equity same ought now to be paid to the said legal heir of said John B. Zanone, respectfully recommend that said bill as presented do pass.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Government offered a certain sum for the use of these premises; the reason for the rejection of that offer I do not understand.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I can explain that in one word. Mr. Zanone insisted, and at that time probably correctly, that his property was worth $150 a month. The Government offered him $75, but he declined to accept the $75 a month, and was still insisting on the Government paying him $150 a month, and he died while that was in process. I introduced a bill for his heir, asking only $75, being the amount which the Government recognized the property was worth. We ask that that amount be allowed, and that is the only reason why the original claim and this claim are different.

Mr. McMILLIN. How did the Government get possession of this property and hold it all these years without any payment.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The Government took possession of it. It was during the war when possession was taken of the property, and it was occupied for four years, or something over, as a marine barracks, but they never paid after getting possession. They entered into and used the property for this length of time and never paid a single cent for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the resolution which was before the House at the hour adjournment on yesterday.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; and also that members having reports from committees may be allowed to file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; and also, that members having reports from committees may be allowed to file them with the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object, but I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to make the announcement that, on behalf of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, we expect to call up the rivers and harbors bill on next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OATES in the chair.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7624) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, in reporting this bill I deem it proper at the outset to call the attention of this committee to the changes which have been made in both the diplomatic and the consular service. The missions have been reduced by placing Denmark, Sweden, and Norway under one mission, Colombia and Ecuador under one mission, Peru and Bolivia under one mission. The missions of Venezuela and Guatemala are salaried at $5,000 a year each.

The saving effected by the reduction of salaries and by the remission of some of the salaried officials to the fees of the several offices, amounts to $62,000. An examination of the report accompanying this bill will show the consulates where the reductions have taken place, the former salaries and the amounts proposed by the committee. The report shows also the compensation at every American consulate and the amount of business done, as indicated by the fees of different kinds.

The reduction made on missions by this bill amounts to $25,000; the reductions on the consulates to $37,000, and the reduction in the Bureau of American Republics is $10,000. The estimates made by the State Department for the fiscal year 1893 amount to $2,138,466.14. The amount reported in the bill is $1,584,925. The difference between the amount asked by the State Department and the amount reported in the bill is $553,541.14.

The act providing for the current fiscal year appropriates $1,656,925. The bill reported recommends, as I have stated, $1,584,925; a reduction of $72,000. While the bill is under consideration, some additional amendments will be offered still further reducing the amount appropriated.

Mr. Chairman, I need not invite the attention of the committee to the spirit which at the outset of this session, and along the line of the consideration of the various objects of appropriation, has indicated a desire on the part of this House for a reduction in the expenditures of the Government, and a belief that extravagance obtains in the administration of public affairs.

Responding to that spirit, the Committee on Foreign Affairs have seen fit to make investigation and inquiry as to whether or not some economy might not be effected in the matter of our foreign relations and the compensation of our consulates. In the early history of the Republic various important and difficult questions arose between it and foreign governments; at one time a paper blockade, at another the seizure of our ships by decrees and orders in council in France and England, at another time questions of citizenship, at another, questions of boundary, and, at another, a manifested purpose on the part of this Republic to withstand any movement proposed by the Holy Alliance, or by any of the European powers, looking to the establishment of their own peculiar political institutions in this western hemisphere.

These questions were all met as they arose, and they have been finally and satisfactorily settled. They came upon us when the Republic was weak, but fortunately, sir, we have now passed beyond them. At that time we utilized the best talent that the country could command. At that time the difficulties of international communication were great, and so were the difficulties of transportation, so, likewise, were the difficulties of intimate knowledge of the relations of other nations with our Republic. Enlarged powers were necessarily granted to our ministers by reason of the then existing situation. The highest order of talent was required to deal with these difficult questions, and the difficulties of which I have spoken rendered such enlarged powers necessary.

How is it to-day? No nation would now attempt to treat this Republic with a paper blockade, no nation will attempt interference with the rights of American citizens, or the seizure of our seamen on the high seas. No territorial questions are now irritating us. No Government conceives for a moment the thought of imposing on Central and South American States political institutions which we have announced we will not tolerate.

The immense area of our territory has been productive of a surplus greater than that of any other nation. Our manufacturing industries have multiplied in variety and extent, providing for human wants in a thousand forms, even before they have been anticipated by our people.

The appreciation and diffusion of popular education obtains throughout the land. A fervor for written constitutions, examined and discussed and interpreted by the various courts, communicated to the people in the courts, on the hustings, and through the press, has silently formed the masses of the American people into one homogeneous whole. The popular character of our institutions, our equal laws, have awakened in our people a consciousness of manhood that has promoted patriotism and national courage.

We are isolated by our position between two oceans. We have no entangling alliances with European politics. The "balance of power," which is so vital a question with European nations, involving in some cases even their political existence, does not disturb us. The action of this or that court, which may portend harm to other nations, excites no interest on our soil. We are not concerned with those questions which in other nations give rise to standing armies and to a condition of constant uneasiness. Our concern is not with those questions, but with finance, with taxation, with commerce, with whatever promotes the general happiness of the people.

European countries may require able diplomats. Not so with us. We have no occasion for the toys of courts. The best talent of the land is found devoted to internal prosperity.

Sir, we see in the press occasionally such items as that our minister to Berlin, Mr. Phelps, after long and laborious efforts, has negotiated an extradition treaty; that our minister to France, with wonderful skill, has negotiated another treaty, and that by reason of his influence at that court he has brought to this country the immense boon of admission of American pork into France at a rate not exceeding 200 per cent. The papers tell us that our minister to Russia is about to return home, and is going to bring with him the delightful intelligence that the Emperor of Russia is very much gratified at the sending of supplies from America to his starving subjects.

The Bering Sea controversy, so far as the public here has had occasion to know, is something of which our minister to the Court of St. James has no knowledge. In South America, during the recent controversy with Chile, the state papers sent in by the President indicate that not until one day before the battle of Concon, and within one week of the fall of Valparaiso and the Chilean Government, our minister to Chile communicated to the State Department the intelligence that there was a movement on the part of the Congressional party along the Huascar Valley which seemed to be of formidable proportions.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to ask in what connection he mentions these circumstances. Certainly he can not but feel most happy that the Emperor of Russia has thanked this country through the American minister, Hon. Charles Emory Smith, that Philadelphia and other American cities have sent food to the starving Russians. I would like to know how he intends to follow up these illustrations. Certainly he proposes to intimate nothing against the manner in which our present minister plenipotentiary to Russia has done his duty.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am undertaking nothing in the world except to show the magnificent ability required of an American minister of to-day.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Speaker, the incident of sending this food to the starving Russians is well worthy to be placed in history, even in the State Department, by an American minister to that country. I do not see how any such references as the gentleman has indulged in can apply in any way to his argument, for I take it for granted that any other business of importance which it might have been necessary for our minister in that country to transact would have been transacted well.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I have a great regard for my friend from Philadelphia—for his splendid temper and general worth; but I think that he ought to allow me to go on with my remarks.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I will, of course. I simply wanted to know in what connection the remarks of the gentleman applied to our American minister to Russia.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this is not a serious conflict between the nations of the earth—

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. But it is a very gratifying thing to all Americans to know that the humanity and heart of this country have prompted this relief of the starving people of another land.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I received from the Secretary of State a communication forwarded by the minister to Denmark containing the very important information (I suppose he had seen this bill or learned of its contents) that in the event we should cut off the mission to Denmark it was not improbable that Denmark would refuse to be represented by exhibits at Chicago. Mr. Chairman, this gentleman seems to have distinguished himself in Denmark by being able to get that Government to make an exhibit at Chicago on grounds personal to himself. At last he seems to have been awakened to his own consequence, and is now trying to rouse the rest of us to realize it.

I think, sir, that he is mistaken: that he overestimates the value of his services, and that Denmark does not value his presence there so highly or regard it of so much importance as he seems to think. I know, sir, that much time is given at these European courts to receptions, to dinners, to entertainments, to balls, operas, and general idleness. Perhaps he is a contribution from this country to scenes like these. But for anything more valuable we are left simply to the exhibit at Chicago. I do not think Denmark will be so silly as to withhold her exhibit here on account of the withdrawal of this minister. If she should, for one I would want the vacant place to be pointed out to our own people as well as to foreigners who visited the Exposition as an indication of what snobbery could do.

I would remind this distinguished minister that if his occupation in Denmark should be lost by the unwise conduct of his countrymen at home, that he will find, doubtless, in his own country, some occupation to relieve him not only from idleness, but possibly from want.

Mr. Chairman, what need have we for a minister at Greece? We are told that Greece is classic ground. But, sir, the muses have long since deserted her mountains. Her beautiful marble no longer awakes the genius of her once gifted sculptors. Her legends are fast passing away from the earth, because the intellectual and moral progress of the age does not stop long or spend much time over the strength of Hercules or the beauty of Apollo, the heroism of Achilles, the wanderings and genius of Ulysses, the beauties of Helen, or the wantonness of Paris. Her halls of philosophy are closed forever. Her seacoast, once the center of an immense commerce, is almost as silent as at the dawn of creation itself. In that land is an ignorant, thriftless, idle population, standing beside the ruined tombs and monuments of a decayed and forever departed greatness. What need have we for a minister at that court, I repeat?

Again, Mr. Chairman, a minister to Switzerland. Providence has taken mountain and water and created there the most bewitching scenery that is exhibited in any portion of the world, and yet, sir, where is there to be found her consideration in the political or commercial relations of the world? She has no standing whatever. Why may we not unite France, Belgium, and the Netherlands in one mission, with the present facilities of intercommunication between these nations? Why not unite Spain and Portugal in the same way? I am inclined to think, sir, that it would not be amiss, nor would it be a radical step in the direction of popular reform, if we would leave at England, France, Germany, Italy, and Turkey our ministers, and whenever there was occasion for intercourse of a delicate character, either to send special agents abroad for that purpose or that these ministers might be a means of communication.

Mr. Chairman, it is useless to talk about maintaining missions in all foreign countries based on any exigencies of the Republic. No such exigencies exist as to warrant the continuation of that system. It is a thing of the past largely. It is a matter of memory solely, and I trust, sir, that it will not be long or that the time will be far distant when these radical corrections will be made all along the line.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, however, have seen fit to make slight reductions here, thinking that perhaps anything that indicated severe or rigid action on their part would be resisted by the magic of that secrecy which hovers about the State Department and the mysticism that lingers there and makes men afraid to think when they are touching that Department.

But, Mr. Chairman, I care to add nothing more to what I have said in relation to these missions abroad. Our consular service is of all others the most valuable and necessary to us. The total of foreign imports of this country for 1890 were $789,310,409. The total imports subject to duty received during the same year were $523,641,780. The total amount of duty collected the same year on these imports was $220,576,989. The correct ascertainment of the valuation of the goods imported into the United States is a matter of vital importance to our revenues. The importer himself is not likely to protect the Government from fraud or undervaluation. It must therefore resort to various instrumentalities to protect itself. Amongst these one of the most potent is our consular system.

Where goods are sent by a purchaser or manufacturer from abroad, it is necessary, in the case of a purchaser, that he shall file an invoice setting forth the value of the merchandise at the place of purchase, the currency in which it was paid, the cost to the place of shipment, and many other items fixed by law and consular regulations, to disclose the value of the goods, where they are liable to a duty on their value, and where the duty is specific disclosing also the weights, measures, etc. This statement is to be accompanied with a declaration as to its truthfulness on the part of the shipper. These invoices have to be certified by the consul from the port where the goods are shipped. Where he differs with the importer as to the value, it must be made to appear, samples of the merchandise sometimes accompanying the statements. This is designed for the purpose of aiding the collector of the port in ascertaining the proper value of the shipment.

I will not take up the time of the committee by reciting the various regulations for the purpose of assuring us in regard to invoices. The great work of the consul is to be found in this matter of certifying invoices. He has sometimes questions in relation to the discharge of seamen, in relation to the support of indigent seamen at the port where he happens to be, sometimes it may be the taking charge of the effects of deceased seamen, sometimes the taking charge of the effects of deceased American citizens, and the administering of their estates, and so forth. I will not undertake to pass through the various topics of consular duties in this connection, because the matters of detail are insignificant. In a few places these consuls are invested with judicial functions, but they are exceptional.

On page 40 of this report is to be found a recapitulation of the fees of consuls, mostly for certifying invoices. Sometimes for certifying invoices, sometimes for landing certificates, etc. I will read from the recapitulation made by the First Auditor, as follows:

RECAPITULATION.
Invoice certificates.....	$896,655.25
Landing certificates.....	33,862.00
Bills of health.....	20,962.50
Currency certificates.....	8,681.00
Other fees.....	11,951.83
Total.....	$978,142.58

These fees almost pay the expenses and should pay the entire expenses of that service. Generally it has been so, but there has been a tendency to enlarge the expenditures for some time, and I believe unnecessarily, and that we ought to curtail them. I will, as we take up the bill by paragraphs—for then it is more easily and intelligently done—discuss the work performed by the consuls at the several ports, with a view of setting out the fact that there has been nothing hastily done.

Indeed, sir, an examination would disclose the fact that there are other places in which the consuls had scarcely any employment, but were getting compensation. For instance, take Athens. The fees, which indicate the work at Athens, are $8. This would not cover five invoices in a twelvemonth. Not a sailor relieved; and yet the consul is on salary there. At St. Helena we have a salaried officer, and his fees were $5.50 per annum; little invoices that he could sign up in a day. There are many places which have been continued because the committee were not inclined to follow out rigidly as they might the principles of economy, apprehending that there might be an exaggerated impression as to the purposes of the committee.

I trust, sir, that when this question shall have been examined, the members of the House and the country will see that this State Department and the foreign service is a secret place. We examine every other. We have detailed information in reference to them; but in this place where the servants are abroad, where our knowledge as to their surroundings is not accurate, and where we are flooded with all sorts of vague suggestions as to their consequence, we should learn to value these as they deserve and make proper deductions.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Before the gentleman leaves that subject I would like to ask a question for information. There are some of these places which the gentleman has referred to where the fees are very small. Now, there has been a very great deal of controversy as to whether certain fees should be turned over to the Government. Is it not probable—or have the committee any information on the subject—as to whether there were other fees collected; and were they of a character which it is claimed should not be turned over to the Government? Now, at Jerusalem, for instance, $50 is all that is reported.

Mr. BLOUNT. What does the gentleman ask?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The point is this: Here we have reported very small amounts at certain places.

Mr. BLOUNT. Take Jerusalem, which you have mentioned.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The question I want to know about is this: There has been a great controversy and loss to us on the question with regard to whether certain fees should be turned over to the Government. Now, have the committee any information as to whether there were any fees of that character collected at these places, which was not turned over to the Government?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not conceive how at Jerusalem there could be any fees. No sailor ever gets there. Service rendered to sailors is one of the items; service to American vessels, and vessels can not get there. I can not see how there is anything in that direction to be done there. But I will say to my friend, if he will allow me, that he and I and the committee will be much more successful in the examination of these various items in detail when we come to take up the bill by paragraphs, and I would prefer that as to any matter of detail my attention should be invited to it later.

Mr. HITT. All these fees reported to the State Department are notarial.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. These are the fees all paid in.

Mr. HITT. The fees are on commerce.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, there is another matter in this bill in which there is not perfect unanimity on the part of the committee. It relates to what may be termed the intercontinental survey. I desire to call attention, and the special attention of the committee, to this object. It imports very much more than appears on the face of the bill. It commits this Government, in my judgment, to policies which the country has not yet discovered, and which the House, in my opinion, has not yet had occasion to examine. The Pan-American Congress, and its assemblage in this country, is a matter well known to the committee.

Amongst the other subjects taken up and discussed by it is what is called the intercontinental railway system, beginning in Mexico, connecting with our lines north, connecting throughout Central America with South America, along through Peru, Chile, Ecuador, and Bolivia, with the eastern coast of those countries; and I wish to call the attention of the committee especially to some suggestions in connection with that subject. On page 43 of this report we are informed:

The International American Conference is of the opinion:

First. That a railroad connecting all or a majority of the nations represented in this conference will contribute greatly to the development of cordial relations between said nations and the growth of their material interests.

I will not read the several sections because it simply occupies time, and is not needful for the purpose I have in view.

Sixth. That if the general direction of the line can not be altered without great inconvenience, for the purpose mentioned in the preceding article, branch lines should be surveyed to connect those cities with the main line.

Seventh. That for the purpose of reducing the cost of the enterprise the existing railways should be utilized as far as is practicable and compatible with the route and conditions of the continental railroad.

Eighth. That in case the results of the survey demonstrate the practicability and advisability of the railroad, proposals for the construction either of the whole line or of sections thereof should be solicited.

Ninth. That the construction, management, and operation of the line should be at the expense of the concessionaires, or of the persons to whom they submit the work or transfer their rights, with all due formalities, the consent of the respective governments being first obtained.

Tenth. That all materials necessary for the construction and operation of the railroad should be exempt from import duties, subject to such regulations as may be necessary to prevent the abuse of this privilege.

Eleventh. That all personal and real property of the railroad employed in its construction and operation should be exempt from all taxation, either national, provincial (State), or municipal.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Will the gentleman tell us what he is reading from?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am reading from the report of the committee on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, at page 43, "section 12." I beg the careful attention of the committee to these sections:

Twelfth. That the execution of a work of such magnitude deserves to be further encouraged by subsidies, grants of land, or guaranties of a minimum of interest.

Thirteenth. That the salaries of the commission, as well as the expense incident to the preliminary and final surveys, should be assumed by all the nations accepting, in proportion to population according to the latest official census, or in the absence of a census, by agreement between their several governments.

Fourteenth. That the railroad should be declared forever neutral for the purpose of securing freedom of traffic.

Fifteenth. That the approval of the surveys, the terms of the proposals, the protection of the concessionaires, the inspection of the work, the legislation affecting it, the neutrality of the road, and the free passage of merchandise in transit, should be (in the event contemplated by article eighth) the subject of special agreement between all the nations interested.

I wish to call the attention of the committee briefly to a letter from the Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, under date of May 12, 1890:

Under the generous and progressive policy of President Diaz the railways of Mexico have been extended southward as well as northward and toward the two oceans. The development of the Argentine system has been equally rapid. Lines of track now reach from Buenos Ayres to the northern cities of that Republic, and nearly to the Bolivian boundary. Chile has a profitable system of railroads from the mountains to the Pacific Ocean, and the completion of the tunnel that is now being pierced through the Cordillera will bring Valparaiso within two days' travel of Buenos Ayres. In the other republics similar enterprise has been shown. Each has its local lines of railways, and to connect them all and furnish the people of the southern continent the means of convenient and comfortable intercourse with their neighbors north of the Isthmus is an undertaking worthy the encouragement and coöperation of this Government. In no other way could the Government and the people of the United States contribute so much to the development and prosperity of our sister Republic and at the same time to the expansion of our commerce.

Now, I wish special attention as to the construction of this report, parts of which I have already read, a construction placed by the Secretary of State upon it.

A very important feature of the report, to which I especially direct your attention—

Mr. COMBS. That is, the Secretary says?

Mr. BLOUNT (continuing the reading):

will be found in the international declaration that the line of the proposed railway shall be forever neutral territory; that the material necessary for the construction and operation of the road shall be admitted free of customs dues, and that its property and revenues shall be always exempt from all forms of taxation. This guaranty, having all the force of a treaty, will stimulate private and public confidence, and thus lead to the investment of capital that might otherwise be reluctant and distrustful.

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to ask my colleague a question. Is there anything in the pending bill which seeks to appropriate any aid to the construction of the railroad to connect the United States with the republics of Central and South America? And is there anything else in this bill relative to the continental survey, except an appropriation of $65,000 to pay our part of the preliminary survey to ascertain whether it is feasible to connect all the republics of the western hemisphere by rail?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for proposing the question. We propose in this bill an appropriation of $65,000—I believe that is the amount—for the share of this country towards the survey itself. How came that survey into this bill? The Secretary of State, in the beginning of last Congress, called attention to this report, and the grand purpose in that survey of having a line of railroad to South America, protected by a pledge, in the nature of a treaty, that it should be forever neutral, the concessionaires getting possession of this road with exemption from taxation, with amounts of subsidies, and grants of land, and guaranties of interest; all these things were as much a part of the scheme as the appropriation in the bill itself.

I intend to briefly read from his report all these allegations which are said to be in the nature of a treaty—

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the gentleman let me interrupt him again?

Mr. BLOUNT. With pleasure; as often as you like.

Mr. MCCREARY. Is it not true that the United States paid thousands of dollars for surveys made in order to ascertain whether it is feasible to have interoceanic canals at Nicaragua and Panama, and if we ever committed ourselves to any subsidy in aid thereof?

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to keep the mind of this House on the proposition made in the report of the International Conference and recommended to Congress, and its purposes stated by the present Secretary of State, to indicate what there is in this measure. What has the survey of Panama to do with this question? Why, I might ask my friend if we did not grant immense domains to the Pacific roads; if we did not indorse bonds and securities for millions of dollars. Yet would the gentleman argue that because we did so that we should cease to have any care for the public Treasury and repeat those extravagances, resulting in crimes against the Government itself?

It is so easy to say, "This is simply a survey." It is not a difficult mental operation to discard a careful consideration of an important question by an innocent suggestion that we have here only a proposition for a survey, but I want to carry this House beyond that. I want to carry it to the point of view of the Secretary of State, with the report of that committee in his hands, indicating the purpose not of a survey alone, but of an obligation on the part of this Government to protect the concessionaires against any violation of any rights which they may obtain in South America.

Suppose, sir, that after this road shall have been constructed, and after there shall have been legislation on the part of Peru, Chile, Bolivia, Ecuador, or any of those countries exempting from taxation the materials connected with the building of the road and exempting the road itself from taxation for all time to come—suppose that after that one of those countries should change its view of the matter and should insist upon its right to tax that property, and this treaty obligation on the part of the United States should be invoked, would we not be compelled, in good faith, to carry our Navy and our Army there to protect these rights?

Suppose that those countries should grant lands to this road, would not we be bound in good faith, having entered into what the Secretary of State says is equivalent to a treaty intended to protect those rights for all time to come—would not we be bound to go with our forces into those republics in order to enforce these rights? The road is "to be exempt from taxation" in Chile, in Ecuador, in Peru, but suppose a change of mind comes over those states and they insist upon taxing it, or for some pecular reasons of their own they resist the free passage of goods over their territories, will not the American Republic be under pledge to march, if need be, its forces into South America to assert and protect the rights of the concessionaires against that Republic?

Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling that this Government shall occupy such an attitude towards those people. It is her proud distinction that when those provinces had shaken off the authority of Spain, and the Holy Alliance had entered into an agreement to reinstate her authority in those republics, to reinstate monarchical authority and monarchical forms of government there, this country, in connection with England, proclaimed the doctrine that it would resist to the furthest extent any such interference on the part of European powers in the affairs of the western hemisphere, and declared that so far as Europe was concerned we had abstained from interference with its governmental affairs, and that on this western hemisphere no European power should place its foot with any such intent. That proclamation was hailed with delight throughout all the civilized world as one of the grandest events in all the course of time.

As an American, sir, I protest against this great Government lending its power and its flag to a corporation to operate in South America, and obligating itself to protect these concessionaires. I do not want any conflicts of that sort for another reason. If they come they are likely to lead to the use of armies and to a policy of force in that part of the American continent. These countries are revolutionary in character; they are continually being disturbed; they are in conflict amongst themselves, and I do not wish to see any line of policy adopted which can by any possibility extend those controversies to us. Chile has just emerged from civil war. The flames of civil war are seen to-day on the horizon of Venezuela. The timbers in the Republic of Brazil are strained and shattered by popular convulsions of which we have almost weekly reports, and I do not want to see any course taken on our part which will embroil us in a conflict which may result ultimately in a policy of conquest. Those people are incapable of preserving order and stability among themselves; bring them into connection with us, with all these troublesome questions, and the equipoise of our institutions, which we enjoy and preserve to-day by reason of the splendid character of our population, will be endangered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what has been going on in relation to this matter. At the first session of the last Congress we appropriated $65,000 as our contribution to the survey. At the second session we appropriated $65,000. We have in this bill a proposition to appropriate $65,000. Bear in mind that these contributions are to be made by the countries concerned pro rata according to population.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Will the gentleman, while he is upon that point, give the committee some information as to who is to have control of the disbursement of this money?

Mr. BLOUNT. This railway commission.

Mr. MCCREARY. Under the approval of the Secretary of State, my friend will admit.

Mr. BLOUNT. The approval of the Secretary of State is somewhat pro forma. I do not see why he should have any trouble with this question, entertaining the views that he does entertain in reference to this South American policy. But, Mr. Chairman, it is sometimes claimed that we are bound in good faith to make this appropriation, that having met these people here and agreed that we would make a survey, and having already made two appropriations, we ought to make the third. Now, while we have been doing that what have they been doing? Brazil has paid her first assessment of $15,000, I think, since this bill was reported, certainly this year. Chile has paid $3,000; Colombia has paid $4,000; Costa Rica has paid $1,000; Bolivia and Ecuador have promised to pay. The Argentine Republic has declined to contribute, but agrees to build through her own territory; that is to say, she has a number of railroads already built, constructed before she had any connection with this project.

Guatemala paid nothing; Mexico declines to contribute, but will complete a line through her own territory—a line which she would complete, at any rate, without any connection with this scheme.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask that the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to proceed until he completes his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. Nicaragua promises to pay; Paraguay declines; Peru has not paid; Salvador promises to pay; Uruguay declines to contribute, but will complete her own line—a scheme which she carries on without any connection with this.

Mr. KILGORE. What was the proportion of the assessment of these different governments? What proportion was each to pay?

Mr. BLOUNT. They were to pay in proportion to population, measured by millions. For instance, this country, with her 65,000,000 population, was to pay a certain sum, and these various other countries on the same basis.

Mr. KILGORE. This railroad was not to approach the boundaries of the United States at all?

Mr. BLOUNT. It was to be a part of the intercontinental system. My friend from Texas may not be able to see the advantage to us, and I do not myself.

Mr. KILGORE. The plan did not propose to construct any railroad inside of the United States?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no; we are to go to South America and build this road.

Mr. KILGORE. We are to build the road, and they are to get the benefit; and we are to pay in the same proportion that they do?

Mr. BLOUNT. We are to enter into this work down there under such conditions as I have indicated, and in return it is expected we shall get the trade of those countries.

Uruguay declines to contribute, but will complete her own line. As to Venezuela we have no information. Most of these countries have not contributed a cent. We have gone on making appropriations, and we have paid nearly all the money that has thus far been contributed. We have our army and naval officers down there engaged in the work of the survey. And in the presence of these facts we are told that though these other countries have not made compliance with the conditions except in a few instances, we have entered into an agreement and are bound to go on and make payments and continue the survey.

Mr. KILGORE. Are we to get any of the glory?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know about the glory. I do not know who are the parties to this concession; I suppose some day we shall learn who is to get the pay, and perhaps we may not learn of anybody, at least in this country, getting any of the glory. It will, I am afraid, be very much like the glory we gained in our grants to our Pacific railroads. There is a genius in this country for that sort of business, and it is very difficult to contravene it.

Mr. LONG. How much money have we already paid?

Mr. BLOUNT. One hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. LONG. To what part of the work does this go?

Mr. BLOUNT. The road is in the Central American and South American states.

Mr. LONG. Have we anybody there looking after this enterprise?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, yes; we have detailed army officers.

Mr. LONG. Enough to take care of it?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the gentleman allow me one more question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY. Was there any minority report put in by any member of the committee opposing this measure?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Kentucky asks whether there was any minority report on this subject. I take pleasure in stating that there was none. I did give notice, however, that there were differences of opinion in the committee in relation to this measure. I did give notice that I considered it of such serious consequence that I proposed to call the attention of the House to this survey. If I have failed to state any of the facts in this connection I trust my friend will bring to the attention of the House whatever I may have left unsaid.

I have come into this House with these views, intending that if the question hereafter should assume the serious aspect which it now presents to my mind, I would, humble as I am, guard myself against any responsibility for this enterprise, and that on this occasion, the first time since these surveys have been started that the Democratic party has been in possession of this House, there should be an opportunity for the House to make its declaration as to whether it would or would not sanction this undertaking. Hitherto the matter has been in the hands of the President, the Secretary of State, a Republican Senate, and a Republican House. There has never been presented to either House of Congress, so far as I know, the information which I have submitted to-day with this correspondence and these various documents.

The question is now here; and whatever the House may do I shall have no complaint to make. But I wish members to bear in mind that if there is any obligation on our part to make any survey, there is, according to Secretary Blaine, an obligation also in the nature of a treaty that this Government shall protect the railroads which may be built in Central and South America under this scheme in all their rights as corporations—exemption from taxation of real and personal property, the right to have brought in free for the building of these roads the material necessary, the guaranty of the neutrality of the roads, the freedom of merchandise over them. All these things, and all necessary legislation for their enjoyment for all time to come, go along with this pledge, according to the Secretary of State.

Away, then, with the idea that it is $65,000. It is far beyond that. Well, sir, we shall be regaled perhaps with the suggestion that the building of this road brings into this land the commerce of South America, that now passes, or the bulk of it, to England and other European countries; that according to Mr. Carnegie railroad transportation is about as cheap as water transportation, and that when we get our railroads we will have freight so cheap that we will get that commerce, notwithstanding the English and other vessels on the ocean. I do not believe, sir, any such doctrine as that. You find in that report where Chile has built her railroads from her mountains to the sea. You will see where the Argentine Republic has built all over its surface, wherever commerce required, her lines of railway; and the tendency of commerce toward Europe has not been by reason of the lack of a railroad system connecting South American countries with this.

It seems to stand on entirely different grounds. Take Argentina, for instance, with her immense wool product. All of this, or the bulk of it, goes to European countries. It finds no customs duties when it enters their ports. The ship goes with a full cargo, and returns with the goods of that country. If the wool seeks this direction it is barred at our ports, and so the ship must come practically empty, and if it goes back at all it goes back with products not as desirable, by reason of cheapness and adaptability to their wants, as those of European countries. In the discussion of the tariff this subject has been so much ventilated that it seems impossible not to feel and understand why that commerce takes the direction it does, instead of a nearer outlet to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have said enough in relation to this scheme. At the proper time I shall move to strike this item out of the bill. But in connection with this we have at the State Department what is known as the International Bureau of American Republics, and provision is made in the bill as follows:

Commercial Bureau of the American Republics, for the prompt collection and distribution of commercial information, as recommended by the International American Conference, $25,000, to be available when the other nations mentioned by the International American Conference pay all their respective assessments.

It has been heretofore $35,000. Now, we have got the bureau in splendid working order. Under the suggestions of the International American Conference we have made a $35,000 appropriation at one session of Congress and $35,000 at another.

I addressed a letter to the Secretary of State in the month of February last, in relation to the contributions from the other republics of South America, which were to contribute according to their population, so much per million, towards the expense of this union. He says in response to that letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 23, 1892.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 18th instant, I have the honor to inform you that, on the several dates hereafter named, this Department received contributions from certain foreign governments towards the maintenance of the Intercontinental Railway Commission and also the Bureau of American Republics.

The amount received for account of the Intercontinental Railway Commission is as follows:

Chile, April 23, 1891	$3,028.12
Colombia, August 20, 1891	4,000.00
Costa Rica, November 3, 1891	1,000.00
Brazil, November 13, 1891 (in process of collection)	15,000.00

The amount received for account of the Bureau of American Republics is as follows:

Venezuela, October 2, 1891	$812.50
Guatemala, December 2, 1891	525.00
Costa Rica, January 13, 1892	75.00
Salvador, January 28, 1892	243.75
Mexico, February 5, 1892	3,900.00

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

HON. JAMES H. BLOUNT,

Chairman of Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives.

These were all the contributions made outside of the Treasury here at Washington by all of these countries, as appears by this communication from Mr. Blaine. When the committee saw fit to criticize this matter and put in this provision "to be available when the other nations mentioned by the International American Conference pay all of their respective assessments," there began to come in some contributions from some of these other countries—not all; and we have gone on in this most refined recognition of our solemn obligation to these South American countries, surveying the railroad almost entirely at our own expense; and, out of appropriations from the public Treasury, keeping up this bureau of information in South America for the benefit of these countries. For one, I want to arrest this whole matter here.

I want to stop this hidden, mysterious thing at the outset. I want to abolish this bureau. The information circulated can be gathered from encyclopedias and from other cheap sources. It is a place for somebody to occupy. It is one of the numerous bureau "sores" to be found in every Department of the Government. It is active; it appeals to the House by having communications sent to members of Congress of its consequence. It struggles for its life. So with this survey. I would strike it out from the bill. I would have this Democratic House say once and for all, "we will not provide a dollar on the ground that hereafter there is carried along with it, as with this other appropriation, obligation to do other things set out in the report, to protect concessionaires, perhaps Jay Gould, Huntington, or Carnegie, or some other of the moneyed kings who may be the concessionaires of this railroad scheme."

I know, Mr. Chairman, that I do not stand in accord with all the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in reference to this question. I know that they believe it is nothing but this survey, that they would not go beyond a survey, that they see immense commerce coming to their country by its operations. My vision is too dim to apprehend these things. I have not separated in all my thoughts every section of this report, the building of the railroad and all of the other following sections, interpreted by the Secretary of State to be a pledge upon my country, as of a treaty itself.

If this is it, as the Secretary of State interprets it, and you wish to pursue his policy, go forward in it. If not, if you decline to follow him in this policy, then let us at once unite together and strike the first blow at this appropriation. Take this money away and this scheme withers. Mr. Carnegie is the soul of this report in every one of its sections. I have read the extract from it, and you will find at some hour that there is something besides what is on the face.

Mr. Chairman, I have thought of presenting some other questions to the committee, but I have occupied much of its time, and I shall forego until some other occasion the indulgence of observations which I think are important in relation to our foreign missions and especially our recent diplomatic efforts in Chilean affairs.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. What is the object of the Bureau that the gentleman speaks of? What does it do?

Mr. BLOUNT. It purports to distribute information.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Is it an educational institution?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, yes.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. To educate?

Mr. BLOUNT. To educate and give merchants information so that they can trade—very valuable information!

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Yes!

Mr. BLOUNT. A "Commercial Bureau of American Republics for the prompt collection and distribution of information, as recommended by the International American Conference." It is an educational institution.

Mr. BURROWS. A very important one.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not a very important one. My friend from Michigan thinks it is important. I have some of the documents it issued, and I will contribute them to him if he will take them.

Mr. BURROWS. If you do not appreciate them, I will take them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not. I do not appreciate any of this business. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel inclined to occupy the attention of the committee any longer. I have gone far beyond anything I expected when I took the floor; but I wish on some future occasion to invite the attention of the House to the unhappy diplomatic attempts that have characterized us in our relations with Chile during all the trouble that the Congressional party had with the Balmaceda government.

Mr. MCCREARY and Mr. HITT rose.

Mr. HITT. If the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] I will ask to be recognized subsequently.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, the diplomatic and consular service of the United States should be maintained in a manner suitable and appropriate to the wealth and population of our great country. Mr. Jefferson announced at the beginning of the present century the true policy of the United States when he said we should have "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none." I believe that was good doctrine at that time, and I believe that every administration should adhere to the grand words spoken by Mr. Jefferson.

There should neither be parsimony nor extravagance in the management of our foreign service, but there should be justice, fairness, and conservatism. I have had the honor to serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs for seven years, and I state here now, with deliberation, whatever may be said about our diplomatic and consular service, we are compelled to admit that it has been maintained economically. The diplomatic and consular service of the great countries of Europe cost annually to each of those countries millions of dollars. How much do we pay in this great country, with 65,000,000 of people and with $65,000,000 of property? Our consular service, excepting two years, has for many years been self-sustaining; and the whole amount that we have to pay out of our Treasury, when we include the amount that we receive from our consular system, is less than one-half million of dollars.

I have great respect for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who has just taken his seat; but the gentleman from Georgia can see a Trojan horse in this bill when there is no just cause for fright. He sounds an alarm when there is no necessity for sounding an alarm. I will go as far as any man to oppose all unnecessary appropriations. I have always, in this House of Representatives, fought subsidies, and I will always be found fighting subsidies, but I do not believe that the record bears my friend out in the statement he has made here to-day with regard to some parts of this diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

There is no necessity to sound the alarm and raise the question of economy on this bill. We are not here to "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." This House has already appropriated in round numbers $24,000,000 in the army appropriation bill. It has appropriated $7,000,000 in the Indian appropriation bill, and $4,000,000 in the District of Columbia appropriation bill; and but a few days ago $23,000,000 in the naval appropriation bill; and you will be called upon to appropriate $25,000,000 in the sundry civil appropriation bill, which my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is ready to call up when we get through with the bill now being considered.

This House has appropriated $134,000,000 for pensions. Now, when we are asking for less than one-half of a million of dollars to pay the expense of our diplomatic service we are told we must pause. We are told that a resolution was adopted at the beginning of this session that called upon us to establish a policy of economy. I voted for that resolution, and still stand by it.

When we maintain a great diplomatic and consular system for this, the greatest Republic in the world, at a net annual cost of less than $500,000, I say we are adhering to the resolution of economy that was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Let us see how we compare with other nations in our expenditures. In Great Britain the ambassadors to Austria, France, and Turkey are paid $40,000 each annually, and each is furnished with a residence. In France the total amount paid the ambassador to Great Britain is $46,000 annually, and $27,000 to the ambassador to Germany, and $17,000 to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States. Germany pays $37,500 per annum to the ambassador to Great Britain. She pays the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States $15,750. Spain pays $21,000 a year to her ambassadors and $17,000 per annum to her envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary. Mexico pays $27,000 per annum to each of her envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the United States, France, and Spain, and $20,900 each per annum to the ministers to Germany, Italy, and Belgium. The United States pay annually $17,500 each to envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and Mexico, and from $12,000 per annum to $5,000 per annum to other diplomatic officers.

I will not occupy time by comparing the diplomatic and consular salaries paid in other countries with those paid in our country, but I will insert at the end of my remarks the tables which have been prepared.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I do not make these references because I am in favor of increasing the salaries. I am opposed to increasing the salaries of our diplomatic officers.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question there? Do I understand that it serves his purpose, and if he is in favor of the consequences coming from them, would he not apply them here?

Mr. MCCREARY. The object of my reference to the salaries in the great European countries is to show that the alarm of my friend from Georgia is needless. When you call the attention of this House to the pledge to stand by the resolution of economy offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] you insinuate, perhaps without intending to do so, that all who support the appropriations contained in the bill now being considered are not remembering the resolutions of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, Mr. Chairman, one word more, if my friend will allow me. I want to know whether he does not regard the foreign relations of European countries among themselves and with the world as of very much more importance to their safety than the foreign relations of the United States with other countries.

Mr. MCCREARY. I regard the foreign relations of the European powers as of great importance to them, and, since my friend has led me into that path, I will say here and now that our foreign relations have been very important to us in the past. There has never been a day since Jefferson was inaugurated President that diplomatic officers were not beneficial to our country.

Go with me back to the beginning of the century. Go to that grand time in the history of the United States, under Jefferson's Administration, when we acquired the Louisiana territory, that grand empire that has been so valuable to the United States, that has brought so much wealth, so much power, so much glory to the United States. Who negotiated the surrender and conveyance of the Louisiana territory to the United States in 1803? That man who was called "the model President," that man who announced the very doctrine that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] referred to in his speech. James Monroe was the minister of the United States to France when we acquired the Louisiana territory.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to one of the most distinguished sons of his State, a man whose name is prominent in the history of Georgia, and of whom the State of Georgia is proud. It was Mr. Forsyth of Georgia, minister of the United States at the court of Spain, who arranged for the acquisition by the United States of Florida. Thus we find that James Monroe negotiated the treaty by which we acquired the great Louisiana territory, and Mr. Forsyth of Georgia, minister to Spain, negotiated the treaty by which we acquired Florida.

Mr. Chairman, I will not dwell upon the early diplomacy of our country, but I will come down to later days. Is there any gentleman here who will deny that valuable services were rendered by Mr. Adams as minister to England during our late unhappy civil war?

Is there any member here who is familiar with Mr. Washburne's great services during the Franco-German war who will deny that the United States were greatly benefited and that the citizens of this country who were in France were greatly benefited by his services? Is there anyone here who doubts that Mr. Motley, Mr. Bancroft Davis, Mr. Everett, Mr. McLane, Mr. Pendleton, and Mr. Lowell rendered valuable service as diplomatic representatives abroad and reflected honor upon themselves and upon their country?

I am ready always to do justice to men who are conspicuous for their ability, for their wisdom, for their patriotism, and I am ready to-day to compliment my former colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, our present minister to Germany, Hon. William Walter Phelps, for his efforts in obtaining a removal of the embargo upon American pork.

I might refer, in this connection, to the valuable services that have been rendered by our foreign ministers in helping to bring about the International American Conference. It was through the aid of our ministers in South America and in Central America and in Mexico that we were enabled to bring together representatives of all the nations of the western hemisphere when the International American Conference was held in the city of Washington. I do not know that my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] intended to refer lightly to that conference; I hope he did not; I shall not construe his language that way.

Mr. Chairman, I regard the International American Conference as one of the grandest conferences ever held in the world. I do not believe that a national conference was ever held that will prove more beneficial in its results than that conference.

But, Mr. Chairman, the question asked me by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] caused me to leave the main subject. I return now to the subject under consideration, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

This bill comes here from the Committee on Foreign Affairs without any minority report. It comes here without having been objected to by any member of the committee, except the gentleman who has just addressed the committee [Mr. BLOUNT]. I agree with him in the belief that there are certain consuls whose salaries are too high, and I acted with him in reducing the salaries of fifty-nine of those officials representing the United States abroad. I agreed with him in uniting the mission of Columbia and Ecuador, saving thereby $10,000 annually; and uniting in one mission Peru and Bolivia, thereby saving $10,000; in uniting Denmark, Sweden, and Norway in one mission, thus also saving $10,000. In the proposed appropriation of $65,000 to carry on, and, as I think, to finish the preliminary survey for the continental railroad which will bring us in closer communication, commercially and socially, with all the republics of the western hemisphere. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and I do not agree, and I do not think any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs agrees with him in his opposition to this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, God in his wisdom seems to have decreed years ago that there should be sympathy and friendship, commercial union, and social relations between all the peoples of the western hemisphere. In the year 1823, when President Monroe announced what is called the "Monroe doctrine," those words of wisdom that are dear to every patriotic heart, he immediately established a sympathy between all the peoples of the American continent, and soon afterwards the peoples in various countries of South America began to overthrow monarchical institutions and to set up republics in their place, taking our Republic for their model.

Now, after the lapse of nearly three-quarters of a century, we have come to a time when the minds of the people of the United States, and the minds of the people of Mexico, and the minds of the people of Central America and South America are turned towards the improvement of social and commercial relations, and the best way to accomplish that great result is by the construction of the intercontinental railway. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that railroad will be built, because within twenty-five years we have constructed longer lines of railroad in the United States than it will be necessary to build in order to furnish railway communication between the city of New York and the metropolis of every Republic of the western hemisphere.

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad is 4,582 miles in length; the Southern Pacific system, including leased lines, 4,702 miles in length; the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad system 4,250 miles in length; the Northern Pacific Railroad system 4,623 miles in length—longer than any line required to be built to bring together all the republics of the western hemisphere.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will allow me to ask whose language he is now reading.

Mr. McCREARY. The length of each railroad is taken from the report of the Railroad Commission.

Mr. BLOUNT. Prepared by Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Davis?

Mr. McCREARY. But not denied by any person. The same statements are made by Lieut. Brown, of the United States Army, the report from which I am reading.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is not the language identical with that which they use in their report?

Mr. McCREARY. They give the length of these lines by the same figures. When distances between two points are given, the language of different individuals is always the same. These gentlemen, showing that these long lines have been built, argue as I do that it is possible and feasible to build these other lines.

Mr. BAILEY. Has the Federal Government ever undertaken to assist in the building of a railroad without scandalizing the whole enterprise?

Mr. McCREARY. I think not; and, Mr. Chairman, I have never been, and am not now, and never shall be, willing to vote one dollar out of the Treasury for the construction of a railroad, for the construction of a submarine cable line, or for the construction of an interoceanic canal. I have a record in Congress consistent with that position.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman will permit me to ask him this further question: What can be the purpose of appropriating $65,000 to ascertain the feasibility of this line, unless, when the feasibility is ascertained, the Government is to assist in its construction?

Mr. McCREARY. I can explain that very readily; and I am very glad my friend from Texas has asked me the question. I was approaching that line of discussion. There are now three railroads passing down through that grand empire State of Texas which is so ably represented on this floor, in part, by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. Those three railroads cross the line between Texas and Mexico, one at Eagle Pass, another at El Paso, and another at Laredo, making the distance from New York to the City of Mexico via El Paso 3,680 miles; via Eagle Pass, 3,174 miles, and via Laredo, 3,026 miles.

These lines are already in operation. The Government of the United States is not asked to contribute one dollar to the construction of the railroad. We have already built lines of railroad down to the Mexican border. Mexico has already taken up our lines at the border and extended them to her beautiful capital, and she is now pushing those railroads on down to the Guatemalan lines. The Government of Mexico, responding to the request for aid in money to help make the preliminary survey for the Continental Railroad, has said: "We will build a line of railroad through Mexico;" and the Government of the Argentine Republic says: "We will build a line of railroad from Buenos Ayres, the commercial city and capital of the Argentine Republic, up to the Bolivian line." Nine hundred and eighty-two miles of that road have already been completed; so that to-day, when we take into consideration the miles of railroad already built and the miles of railroad already under construction, only 2,870 miles of railroad have to be constructed to give an all-rail line from the city of New York to Buenos Ayres, in the Argentine Republic.

In Guatemala and in some of the other Central and South American Republics the country is rough and mountainous, and some have doubted whether a railroad could be built on the line desired. But when the Baltimore and Ohio system crossed the Alleghenies, and when a railroad was built across the Rocky Mountains, it was believed feasible to build a railroad that would connect all the republics of the Western Hemisphere.

Some of the small republics of Central and South America have not the money with which to build railroads, and therefore donate lands, and this causes the criticism of the gentleman from Georgia, who said that subsidies in the way of land would be called for to build the Continental Railroad. When he read to you the report of the railroad commission he did not read the names of the gentlemen who signed it. I have here that report which he read. He did not give you the names of those gentlemen who signed that report, but he dwelt at some length upon the twelfth paragraph of that report, which states that—

The execution of a work of such magnitude deserves to be further encouraged by subsidies, grants of land, or guarantees of a minimum of interest.

By whom is the report signed? It is signed by sixteen gentlemen; two of them are United States commissioners, while fourteen represent the republics south of us. They do not build railroads in the Argentine Republic, and Peru, and Bolivia, and Colombia, and Guatemala in the same manner we do. In many of those countries the government builds the railroads or donates land to individuals who build them. That is the way they expect to build this Continental Railroad. We are not asked for a dollar, and we will not be asked for a dollar.

But if, Mr. Chairman, we are asked to contribute money to build the road I shall be found always opposing it. There are members here present who remember that I almost alone at the last session of Congress opposed a subsidy of $3,000,000 asked in a bill which had already passed the Senate to construct a submarine cable line between San Francisco and the Hawaiian Islands; and this House, Democrats and Republicans alike, in sufficient number voted against the bill and defeated it. We have to-day eight submarine cable lines that connect the United States with the great commercial centers of the world, all controlled by syndicates or corporations, each of them authorized by an act of Congress to build these submarine cable lines, and yet, so far as I know, Congress was never asked to contribute a dollar to build them, and they have never received pecuniary aid from the United States Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not quite get at a harmonious understanding of the statement that the governments of these South American Republics build the lines of railroads, in connection with the suggestion the gentleman has just quoted that they are expected to have subsidies, grants of land, etc. Where does the subsidy come from?

Mr. McCREARY. I will state to the gentleman that the governments of many of the Central and South American countries own large tracts of lands and sometimes make land donations to syndicates, companies, or individuals who are willing to take the lands and build the roads.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the syndicate builds the road?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. That is about the way they do here. Who owns it?

Mr. McCREARY. Well, let me say to the gentleman—

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask who owns the road when it is built?

Mr. BLOUNT. If it will not interfere with my friend from Kentucky, I would suggest, by way of addition to his argument, that some of these roads are built by the Government itself, while others are subsidized.

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, there are a few instances where the Government has built railroads in South America, but their plan of constructing railroads is different from ours.

The amount asked for in the bill on the part of the United States to aid in making the preliminary survey is $65,000. That amount has been appropriated twice in other general appropriation bills, and the survey is more than half completed. Shall we abandon the half-finished work, or appropriate $65,000 more, with a view to the completion of it? I believe it was right in the beginning that we should appropriate $65,000 to the preliminary survey. Why do I believe it?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say it with some modesty, but it is known to the older members of this House, that I am the author of the bill which caused the assembling in this city of the International American Conference. That bill provides in its first paragraph for the very railway that to-day is criticised. That bill, which was approved by Mr. Cleveland when President of the United States and under which invitations were sent out to every republic south of us by Mr. Bayard, his Secretary, that bill was a Democratic measure; and that bill provided in its first sentence for the very communication that we are seeking now to establish through the means of this continental railway. Here is what it provides:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby requested and authorized to invite the several governments of the Republic of Mexico, Central and South America, Haiti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil, to join the United States in a conference to be held at Washington, in the United States, at such time as he may deem proper in the year 1893, for the purpose of discussing and recommending for adoption to their respective governments some plan of arbitration for the settlement of disagreements and disputes that may hereafter arise between them, and for considering questions relating to the improvement of business intercourse and means of direct communication between said countries and to encourage such reciprocal commercial relations as will be beneficial to all and secure more extensive markets for the products of each of said countries.

SEC. 2. That in forwarding the invitation to the said governments the President of the United States shall set forth that the conference is called to consider—

First. Measures that shall tend to preserve the peace and promote the prosperity of the several American states.

Second. Measures toward the formation of an American customs union, under which the trade of the American nations with each other shall, so far as possible and profitable, be promoted.

Third. The establishment of regular and frequent communication between ports of the several American states and the ports of each other.

Fourth. The establishment of a uniform system of customs regulations in each of the independent American states to govern the mode of importation and exportation of merchandise and port duties and charges; a uniform method of determining the classification and valuation of such merchandise in the ports of each country, and a uniform system of invoices and the subject of sanitation of ships and quarantine.

Fifth. The adoption of a uniform system of weights and measures, and laws to protect the patent rights, copyrights, and trade-marks of citizens of either country in the other, and for the extradition of criminals.

Sixth. The adoption of a common silver coin, to be issued by each Government, the same to be legal tender in all commercial transactions between the citizens of all the American states.

Seventh. A general agreement and recommendation for adoption to their respective governments of a definite plan of arbitration of all questions, disputes, and differences that may now or hereafter exist among them, to the end that all difficulties and disputes between such nations may be peaceably settled and wars prevented.

Eighth. To consider such other subjects relating to the welfare of the several States represented as may be presented by any of said States which are hereby invited to participate in said conference.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be disbursed under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State, for expenses incidental to the conference.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, ten delegates to said conference, who shall serve without compensation other than their actual necessary expenses, and the several other States participating in said conference shall be represented by as many delegates as each may elect: Provided, however, That in the disposition of questions to come before said conference, no State shall be entitled to more than one vote.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State shall appoint such clerks and other assistants as shall be necessary, at a compensation to be determined by him, and provide for the daily publication by the Public Printer, in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages, of so much of the proceedings of the conference as it may determine, and upon the conclusion of said conference, shall transmit a report of the same to the Congress of the United States, together with a statement of the disbursement of the appropriation herein provided for.

Approved, May 24, 1883.

This bill was passed by a Democratic House of Representatives, and every Democrat voted for it, so far as the record shows, and every Republican voted for it, so far as the record shows. It was approved by President Cleveland. What was the next step? In pursuance of the bill Mr. Bayard, then Secretary of State, sent a letter by authority of the President of the United States to the chief officer of every republic and of every country mentioned in the bill, and called attention in his letter to the fact that one of the purposes of the conference was to "consider questions relating to business intercourse and means of direct communication between said countries."

My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] raises an alarm because he says Mr. Blaine in a letter has intimated that Congress might be bound in some way to contribute money to build the railroad. I deny that that letter of the Secretary of State is susceptible of that construction, and I deny also that Mr. Blaine has the power to commit us or to commit Congress to any agreement to furnish money for any purpose.

The position taken by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is untenable. We are not asked here to appropriate money to construct a railroad; we are only asked to carry out our part of an agreement. When the representatives of the United States met the representatives of all the republics south of us it was believed that they should carry out the very first paragraph of the bill which called them together, to do what they could toward encouraging communication between the republics of the American continent. They did that, and they agreed that there should be paid by each of the countries $1,000 for every million of population. Our amount is $65,000, and we have paid that already twice. Shall we now abandon this solemn agreement and prove faithless to it? We are only bound so far as a preliminary survey. Shall we abandon the agreement when we are more than half through with the work, or shall we appropriate $65,000 now and finish that work?

I say now, as I said in the committee, that we ought to appropriate the $65,000 and finish the survey. If we should now fail to perform our part of the agreement, we might lose the benefit of the work that has been more than half completed. Let us go on with it. And as certainly as I am standing here, in this age of progress, of improvement, of advancement, of steam, in a few years a man can get on a train in the city of New York and get off at Buenos Ayres, in the Argentine Republic. Such is the progress that now awaits us; and I for one am ready and willing to help with this little pittance. It does not amount to much; and yet there are men who ask, "Why do you want this?" We want it first because it will forever settle the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine.

I hope the members of the House will listen to the words uttered by Mr. Monroe, who declared in his message—

That the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers. We owe it to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the European powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and our safety.

With existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere; but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

We have maintained that doctrine ever since it was uttered by Mr. Monroe, except once for a short time, when Maximilian was put upon the throne in Mexico, but as soon as the United States was able to gather strength and to get ready to enforce the Monroe doctrine the Government of this country did its duty and again maintained that doctrine. The people of the republics south of us are our neighbors. They have modeled their governments after ours. They are bound to us by closer commercial and social ties than to the people of any other country in the world. They are making a plea in favor of commercial union and more intimate friendship, and when they come to us and "ask for bread shall we give them a stone?"

But there is another reason why I am in favor of making the appropriation for the preliminary survey. There are 50,000,000 of people in these republics south of us. Their trade amounts to $998,000,000 annually. Where does their trade go now? Four-fifths of it goes across the ocean to England, France, and Germany, and only one-fifth of it is with the United States; and we ought to have it all. In the United States to-day we are suffering because of overproduction of nearly everything. We want markets. Markets will improve the business and trade of our country.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCCREARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think a railway would bring us commerce from these countries with their present system of building custom-houses on the lines to prevent trade?

Mr. MCCREARY. I hope, with my friend from Kansas, before many moons pass, that the odious tariff law which we now have will be so amended or repealed that we will not have to think that it is an obstacle or lion in our pathway.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman, then, tell me why his party, which is three to one here, does not bring in a bill to repeal this law, if he thinks it is so odious?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Because you would all vote against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCREARY. I will answer the gentleman. The party to which I belong tried a few years ago to get the Morrison bill considered in this House, and the Republican party refused then to consider it. Then we passed the Mills bill in this House, and sent it to the Senate, and the Republican Senate refused to pass it, and now we present independent measures, such as a free-wool bill, a bill making cotton-ties free, etc. Republican Congressmen oppose these. If we can not get all we want we propose to take what we can get. We fought for a general tariff bill and gained a victory in the House, but you beat us in the Senate. We referred the matter to the people of the United States at the November election and there we were victorious, but you are still joined to your idols and will not be corrected by the people.

Mr. WALKER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows of any other way in the world of getting what he proclaims he wants but voting for it and going to the people on the issue?

Mr. MCCREARY. We expect to go to the people at the November election, and we expect not only to sweep you Republicans out of Congress, but to put a Democratic President in the White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WALKER. Then, why not pass your bill and go to the country upon the issue?

Mr. MCCREARY. We will give you thunder enough before we get through with you.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. MCCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not your experience show that the freight rates on railroads are so much higher than the rates by water that we will not get the freight by railroad if we can not get it by water?

Mr. McCREARY. I am glad the gentleman from Iowa asked the question. There is nothing in the world that is so instructive as an object lesson.

Mr. BUTLER. Am I that object lesson? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCREARY. No, sir; you are not the object lesson. But I state that I am glad the gentleman asked me that question. We ought never to become alarmed unless there is something to alarm us. I happen to have what I said is an object lesson.

In the last few years, through the wisdom of President Diaz of the Republic of Mexico and the Congress of the Mexican Republic, we have railroad communications between the United States and the City of Mexico. We expect to have more railroad communication before long, and I hope it will be remembered that all the railroads from the City of Mexico to the United States border did not cost the United States a dollar. During the year ending June 30, 1873, the imports into Mexico from the United States were $5,231,254, and the exports to the United States were $11,367,859. Now, contrast that with the present time. We have railroad communication now. In 1889 the imports amounted to $22,669,420, and the exports, $43,032,440, an increase in the former of over $17,000,000, and of the latter of nearly $32,000,000; and perhaps the great secret of it is railroad communication between Mexico and the United States.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Which does the gentleman call the exports?

Mr. McCREARY. The exports from the United States.

My friend here, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS], says we should add $20,000,000, because the business which comes by railroad, or a great deal of it, is not taken into account in the estimates.

Mr. COOMBS. Not a dollar.

Mr. McCREARY. Thus we see that our trade with Mexico has increased fourfold in the last fifteen or sixteen years.

Give us a railroad connecting us with the other countries and the same results will follow. Take Venezuela as another illustration. Eight years ago our trade with Venezuela amounted to only $8,000,000. The report I have before me shows that our trade with that country now amounts to a little over fifteen millions. We have no railroad there, but we have improved communication by water.

Mr. BUTLER. The increase is at as great a rate, is it not, where there is improved water communication as where there is a railroad?

Mr. McCREARY. The increase of our trade with Venezuela has not been as great as the increase of our trade with Mexico, but the gentleman should remember also that there are several republics in South America which can not be reached by water. Again, he should remember that we are to get the railroad communication between our own country and these republics without any cost to the United States, whereas if you have to appropriate money out of the Treasury to secure improved water communication it will cost a large amount.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman suppose that I would want to appropriate money out of the Treasury to improve water communication with those countries? Does he not know that I am no friend of subsidies?

Mr. McCREARY. I did not say that you would vote to appropriate money for that purpose, but I say you would have to do it if you wanted to get improved water communication.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not believe in subsidies, either to railroad lines or steamship lines, nor do I believe subsidies necessary to a development of improved water or land communication. The only aid needed is a removal of present restrictions.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I have here a statement showing our trade with all the Central and South American countries. I will not weary the committee by reading the various statements, but I will print them with my remarks.

Argentine Republic exported to the United States in 1889 goods amounting to $5,500,000 gold, and in 1890 $6,000,000, and imported from us in 1889 articles to the value of $8,376,077, and in 1890 $9,307,315.

The principal articles of export being minerals, wool, tallow, hides, skins, bones, cattle, sheep, etc., and of import wearing apparel, tools, agricultural implements, furniture, canned goods and other food substances, liquors, iron railway materials, machinery, crockery, glassware, pottery, chemicals, fancy articles, coin bullion, etc.

Bolivia, having no seacoast, is obliged to send its exports and receive its imports through the ports of Peru, Chile, or Argentine, hence it is impracticable to give its trade with the United States; but its present trade with our country is small, because of no direct transportation facilities. Its yearly foreign commerce is estimated at $35,000,000.

Brazil imported from the United States goods amounting in 1888 to $7,063,893, in 1889 $9,276,511, and in 1890 $12,000,000, and exported to the United States in 1888 $54,000,000, in 1889 $60,000,000, and in 1890 $61,000,000, our imports being principally coffee, rubber, sugar, and hides, and our exports, breadstuffs, cotton goods, manufactured articles, petroleum, lumber, agricultural implements, etc.

The foreign trade of Brazil amounts to $240,000,000 annually, about equally divided between imports and exports.

Chile imported from the United States in 1888 $2,450,000; in 1889 $2,970,000, and in 1890 $3,220,000 worth of goods, and exported to the United States in 1888 $2,900,000, in 1889 $2,650,000, and in 1890 $3,183,000. Her principal imports from us were iron and steel manufactures, cotton goods, wood and its manufactures, mineral oils, agricultural implements, meat and dairy products, chemicals, drugs, dyes, etc., and her exports, nitrate of soda, raw wool, hides and skins, fruits, etc. The annual foreign trade of Chile is about $122,032,560, of which $55,000,000 are imports and $67,000,000 exports.

Colombia imported from the United States in 1889 merchandise to the value of $3,729,000 and exported to the United States $4,264,000, her principal imports from us being wheat flour, iron and steel manufactures, provisions, meat and dairy products, cotton goods, wood, furniture, refined sugar, chemicals, drugs, etc., and her principal exports coffee, hides and skins, fruits, India rubber and gutta-percha, crude cocoa, chemicals, drugs, etc. The annual foreign commerce of Colombia is about $22,000,000.

Costa Rica imported from the United States about $1,500,000 in 1890 and exported to the United States over $1,600,000 worth of goods. Forty thousand tons of bananas alone were brought to the United States and 45,000 sacks of coffee, the United States having now a larger trade with Costa Rica than any other country. The total commerce of Costa Rica amounted, for the year 1889-'90, to about $10,220,000 gold, of which $5,360,000 were exports and $4,860,000 imports, the principal exports from Costa Rica being coffee, hides, skins, India rubber, etc.; the imports woolen, linen, and cotton goods, machinery, agricultural implements, tools, furniture, hardware, etc.

Ecuador imported from the United States in 1889 $756,000, and in 1890 $715,000, and exported to the United States in 1889 $695,000, and in 1890 $534,000 worth; these imports being principally provisions, meat and dairy products, iron and steel, cotton goods, wheat flour, chemicals, drugs, etc., and the exports, cocoa, India rubber, crude gutta-percha, coffee, hides and skins, etc. The total foreign commerce of Ecuador amounts to nearly $16,000,000 annually.

Most of the trade to and from the interior has to be carried on by means of pack animals, a slow, expensive, and difficult method, which impedes the development of commerce and agriculture. Once build a railroad through this country, connecting with Peru on the one hand and with Colombia and Central America on the other, and an impetus would be given to trade that could not be checked.

Guatemala imported from the United States in 1889 $1,300,000, and in 1890 $1,350,000 worth, and exported to the United States in 1889 $2,347,000, and in 1890 $2,290,000 worth of goods; these imports being cotton and woolen goods, railroad and agricultural materials and implements, hardware, etc.; the exports coffee, hides, rubber, sugar, bananas, etc. Coffee represents in quantity and value nine-tenths of the exports. The total foreign trade of Guatemala amounted in 1889 to $16,000,000.

Nicaragua imported from the United States goods in 1888 to the value of $861,156, in 1889 $900,813, and in 1890 $1,270,063, and exported to the United States in 1888 $1,496,171, in 1889 $1,747,246, and in 1890 $1,665,690; these imports being principally machinery, iron, steel, wheat, flour, provisions, manufactured goods, etc.; and the exports coffee, crude India rubber, bananas, hides, and skins, etc. The total foreign trade of Nicaragua amounts to $3,000,000 annually.

Paraguay: As there is no direct commercial intercourse between the United States and Paraguay, it is impracticable to state the amount of trade between the two countries. Paraguay having no seaports, all her foreign trade must go via Buenos Ayres or Montevideo; the absence of complete railroads requires her imports to be carried by inland navigation over her principal rivers, the Paraguay and Parana. However, the total commerce of Paraguay is about $6,000,000 annually.

Peru: Owing to the absence of American steamship lines and trunk-line railroads, our commerce with Peru is very small; our exports to that country in 1888 amounted to only $865,160, and in 1889 to $773,244; and our imports in 1888 to $309,040, and in 1889 to $314,032.

The total foreign trade of Peru, however, amounts to over $14,000,000 annually, controlled principally by England, but also partially by France and Germany.

Peru is an exceedingly rich country in natural resources and only needs the awakening influence of the modern railroad to develop these possibilities and to secure the United States the major part of the trade now monopolized by European countries.

Salvador imported from the United States goods in 1888 amounting to $656,076, and in 1889, $538,000; and exported to the United States, in 1888, $1,913,742, and in 1889, $1,515,000; these imports being mainly provisions, flour, cotton and woolen goods, manufactured articles, hardware, crockery, etc., and the exports coffee, indigo, sugar, cocoa, etc. The total foreign trade of Salvador amounts to over $3,000,000 annually.

Uruguay: The commerce of Uruguay is chiefly with Europe, owing to the lack of facilities for transportation and communication between the former country and the United States. Nevertheless during the past few years our country has had a share of this trade, purchasing bones, bone ash, cowhides, dry and salted skins, calfskins, horsehair, etc., and selling lumber, kerosene, cotton goods, machinery, etc. The exports from the United States to Uruguay amounted in 1888 to $1,337,430, and in 1889 to $2,027,383, while the imports from Uruguay were, in 1888, $2,711,521, and in 1889, $2,986,964. The total foreign commerce of Uruguay amounts to nearly $58,000,000 annually.

Venezuela: The exports from the United States to Venezuela amounted in 1888 to $3,008,515; in 1889, to $3,738,961, and in 1890, to $4,028,583; while the imports amounted in 1888 to $10,051,250; in 1889, to $10,392,596, and in 1890, to $10,966,765; exports and imports amounting in 1890 to about $15,000,000. The principal exports from the United States to Venezuela are wheat flour, lard, cotton goods, manufactures of iron and steel, chemicals, oils, provisions, etc., and the imports, coffee, hides and skins, cocoa, drugs, guano, fruits, etc.

The total foreign trade of Venezuela is $39,000,000 annually, of which the United States now enjoys a larger proportion than any other country, due mainly to the fact that the steamship lines recently established have afforded an easy method of intercommunication between these two republics.

I return now to the paragraph in the bill providing for the appropriation for this continental railroad. It reads as follows:

CONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Payment of the share of the United States of the expense of a preliminary survey for a continental railway as recommended by the International American Conference, to be available when the other nations mentioned by the International American Conference pay all their respective assessments, $65,000.

I desire now with emphasis to call the attention of the chairman and of the members of this committee to that paragraph in the bill which provides for an appropriation of $65,000, when these other republics pay their parts according to the agreement. So, then, no money will be paid by the United States until the other countries pay their part.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMPSON. When this preliminary survey is made does the Government propose to build the railroad?

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman did not hear me fully, or he would not ask that question. There is nothing in this bill pledging the Government to pay one dollar toward the construction of the railroad. If there was any such thing in the bill, anything that required this Government to build the railroad or to contribute to its construction, I should be opposed to it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, after this preliminary survey is made, will they turn it over to a private corporation, and if so, is there any provision in your bill to compel that corporation to reimburse the Government for the money expended for the preliminary survey?

Mr. McCREARY. The object of the preliminary survey, as I stated in the beginning, is to ascertain and to show that it is feasible to construct this road. The distance between the northern terminus of the Argentine Republic railroad and the southern terminus of the Mexican railroad extending towards Guatemala is now 4,900 miles. Of that distance 230 miles have been built and are in running order, and 1,800 miles are in process of construction; leaving about 2,870 miles of the railroad not yet built. Three corps of engineers are making surveys for the purpose of determining whether it is practicable and feasible to construct the railroad or not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And, as I understand, those surveys will be public property?

Mr. McCREARY. Of course they will be public property. The surveys are being made by three corps of engineers, one corp organized in the United States, and the other two organized elsewhere. As I have already stated, they are supported by contributions from the nations concerned, at the rate of $1,000 per million of inhabitants; the United States agreeing to pay $65,000 per annum, and the other countries according to their population.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague on the committee be extended so that he may finish his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McCREARY. Amounts so far contributed by the Central and South American governments towards the preliminary surveys for the Continental Railway, are as follows:

Countries.	Actually paid.	In course of collection.
Bolivia.....		$2,000.00
Brazil.....	$15,000.00
Chile.....	3,028.12
Colombia.....	4,000.00
Costa Rica.....	1,000.00
Ecuador and Nicaragua.....		2,000.00
Totals.....	23,028.12	4,000.00
Grand total.....		27,028.12

Argentine Republic declines to contribute money, but will build the railway through its own territory.

Ecuador paid the expenses of the transportation of corps 2 and 3 of the Intercontinental Railway engineers from Guayaquil to Quito, estimated at 1,500 sucres, or $1,020.

Guatemala has furnished four engineers to assist in making the surveys, but has not yet paid in any money.

Mexico declines to contribute money on the ground that she will complete the railway through her own territory.

Nicaragua has given assurances of the payment of her quota. Paraguay not yet paid.

Bill pending before the Peruvian Congress for the payment of its share.

Salvador has promised to pay its quota.

Uruguay declines to contribute money on the ground that it will complete the railway through its own territory.

Venezuela: No definite information so far received.

From the above summary it appears that Mexico, Argentine Republic, Paraguay, and Uruguay have declined to contribute money towards the preliminary surveys, and in that respect may be said not to have accepted the recommendations of the International American Conference.

So that we find only Paraguay and Venezuela have declined to furnish any money or to build a railroad.

Mr. SIMPSON. Here is my point, if the gentleman will allow me. This survey having been made at public expense at a cost of $60,000, and the fruits of the work belonging to the Government, is there any provision in your bill that when this survey is handed over to any corporation for the purpose of having the road built, this corporation shall pay the Government for this very valuable information? Or is it proposed to give it to the corporation that may build the road?

Mr. McCREARY. There is no provision in the bill that any company who may build this railroad shall pay back to us the small amount of the cost of the preliminary survey; neither is there in the bill anything requiring those who may build the railroad to pay back to the other republics south of us what they have contributed. For myself I believe that the vast and incalculable benefits that are to be derived by the construction of this railroad are such that we ought not to stop and ask the return of the pittance which we furnish in order to enjoy these great benefits.

Mr. SIMPSON. Why not have the Government, then, build the road at once?

Mr. McCREARY. I am opposed to the Government building railroads. I want to say to my friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], who I suppose is familiar with what the Government has done in this direction in the past—

Mr. SIMPSON. Very well—

Mr. McCREARY. That Congress spent hundreds and thousands of dollars in order to ascertain the feasibility of building an interoceanic canal at Panama or at Nicaragua. I have here on my desk two reports made by officers who were sent down there by our Government. The object of the United States was simply to determine whether it was feasible to connect the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans in the interest of commerce and trade.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then the Government ought to have dug the canal itself.

Mr. McCREARY. As I have stated, I have always on this floor opposed and spoken against the Government giving any aid to the construction of the Nicaragua or the Panama Canal.

Mr. BUSHNELL. At this time, does anybody doubt the feasibility of building this railroad?

Mr. McCREARY. I will say to my friend that when this railroad was commenced I had not up to that time met anybody who knew the project was feasible and practicable. But in modern times our feats of engineering have been so great that men have concluded they could push a railroad almost anywhere; and now, when that work is more than half completed, the belief is growing—it has become almost a certainty—that that road can be built. I am in favor, therefore, of finishing the survey and establishing beyond question the fact that the railroad can be built; that it is feasible.

Mr. BUSHNELL. One object of the survey, as I understand, is that the very best route may be ascertained and selected.

Mr. MCCREARY. I thank my friend for the suggestion. That is one of the great objects. In addition to establishing the practicability of the construction of the road, one important purpose of the survey is to ascertain the best route.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me one question for information?

Mr. MCCREARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Have you any assurance that after the survey is completed, and the practicability of the scheme settled, capital will be forthcoming with which to build this road?

Mr. MCCREARY. None whatever. And when I first came to Congress I had no assurance that capital would be furnished for the completion of a railroad from the Texas border to the City of Mexico. And when I first came here as a boy to visit this House of Representatives, I had no idea that the Baltimore and Ohio system could be pushed through the Allegheny Mountains, or that the Chesapeake and Ohio system could accomplish what has been accomplished.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Or that anybody could cross the Rocky Mountains with a railroad.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is not the question.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. MCCREARY. I yield for one more question; and then I must go on, for I have occupied too much time.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that the character of the gentleman from Kentucky is such that no one will make any misinterpretation of my question; hence I take the liberty of asking whether it is not the fact that such remarks as the gentleman is now making have been used on this floor as the basis for every subsidy and every scheme of governmental aid that has been proposed in this country?

Mr. MCCREARY. No, sir; and if the gentleman had been in Congress at least one term he would not ask the question.

I stood on this floor and advocated the incorporation of the Nicaraguan Canal Company, but is there any member present who will contend that when the bill was passed by Congress that there was any intention of aiding the enterprise with a subsidy? Our country is not illiberal, and while I favor economy in public expenditures, and have always advocated it, and expect always to do so as long as I am in public life, yet I believe there is a time in the affairs of government as well as in the affairs of men, when a dollar properly spent, like bread cast upon the waters, will repay after many days a hundredfold.

It is only a question of fair play, a question of simple justice. Our weaker brethren in the republics south of us should not furnish all of the money for the preliminary survey of this railroad, pour all their wealth into the lap of the United States, and we be unwilling to pay our part of the small amount that will be needed to make this preliminary survey. Putting it on the higher plane of business intelligence, having twice appropriated the sum of $65,000, thus making $130,000, and believing, as I do, that one more appropriation of $65,000 will complete the preliminary survey, I say it is good business now to make this additional appropriation and allow the survey to be finished.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the paragraph in reference to the Bureau of American Republics. My friend from Georgia spoke of his intention to make a motion to strike out the appropriation for that Bureau. The Bureau of American Republics was authorized by the International American Conference. It was believed with truth that the people of the United States did not know as much about the people of the republics south of us, either as to their customs and manners or their products and industries, as we ought to know; and it was also believed that the people of these kindred republics did not know as much about this great Republic, its industries, products, commerce, and advantages, as they ought to know; and therefore, after careful consideration, the International American Conference recommended that a Bureau of American Republics be established and that an amount of $36,000 be furnished annually to pay the expenses of the Bureau.

The appropriation was fixed at $325 to each million of inhabitants, and was so apportioned amongst these republics that each one of the countries was required to pay a certain sum. These countries have seemingly appreciated their opportunities to ascertain important matters with regard to their sister republics and have come forward with great promptness and paid the amount they were required to pay. I hold in my hand a letter written by the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Wharton, addressed to me, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, D. C., April 13, 1892.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry, I beg leave to state that Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Venezuela, Haiti, and the Argentine Republic have paid their assessments for the maintenance of the Bureau of American Republics. Haiti has also paid for one year in advance. The Department is advised that the assessments of Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Uruguay, and Brazil have been forwarded, but the drafts have not yet been received. It is also advised that provision has been made for the payment of the assessments of Colombia and Paraguay. The President of Santo Domingo, in his message submitted to the Congress of that Republic on the 5th of March last, recommends an appropriation to pay its share in the support of the Bureau, leaving Chile as the only one of the American republics to be heard from.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant.

WILLIAM F. WHARTON,

Hon. JAMES B. MCCREARY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Assistant Secretary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask, what is the date of that letter?

Mr. MCCREARY. April 13, 1892.

Mr. HOLMAN. In this report I find a communication from the State Department dated February 23, 1892—

Mr. MCCREARY. Yes, sir; I remembered that statement, and I sent to the Department and got the latest available information.

Mr. HOLMAN. This statement in the report shows that the total amount paid by these different countries for both purposes, for the railway and the Bureau of American Republics, was only $13,583.

Mr. MCCREARY. Does the gentleman dispute the letter from Assistant Secretary Wharton, written on the 13th of April, 1892?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; but it is remarkable there should be such a difference between two statements—

Mr. MCCREARY. It is not remarkable when you remember that this Bureau has been lately established, only about a year ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, we have already made two different appropriations for it.

Mr. MCCREARY. Two months have elapsed since that first communication was received, and as this Bureau has only been recently organized, the gentleman will see that there is reason for what he calls a discrepancy.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have made appropriations in the past and have paid on this account about $202,000.

Mr. MCCREARY. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is mistaken. The whole amount provided for is $36,000 per annum, and after deducting what the other republics have paid the part of the United States, I think, is less than forty thousand dollars.

We have poor mail facilities with the countries south of us, and if the gentleman should write a letter to the Argentine Republic or Colombia or Peru, it would first go to Europe and then go back across the ocean, taking between two and three months to get to its destination. Mail communication is very slow and I am anxious to improve it. But we find that so far as the Bureau of American Republics is concerned all of those countries have contributed the amount required of them except Chile.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just another fact. Chile is reported here as having paid $3,038.12, and that letter is from the Secretary of State.

Mr. MCCREARY. This is from the Assistant Secretary of State.

I hold in my hand a statement showing the bulletins of the Bureau of American Republics, amounting to 142,500 copies. Some of them you will all recognize. Handbook No. 1 is one of the best books on Central and South America ever published. Handbook No. 2 is a most excellent book. But I will not enumerate them. There have been 142,500 copies of these handbooks and pamphlets which have been issued by that Bureau.

Now, the object of this Bureau, as I said in the beginning, is to educate. It is to inform the people of the western hemisphere of the industries and products and resources and the commercial advantages of all the countries of the western hemisphere.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. As the gentleman has referred to that, let me ask this question: It is admitted that it is for the purpose of educating all these countries, ours included, in all probability. Now, will the gentleman be kind enough to tell me where he gets the authority to appropriate the public money for the purposes of education?

Mr. CULBERSON. To educate Congressmen?

Mr. COX of Tennessee. To educate Congress or to educate anybody else.

Mr. MCCREARY. This Government has repeatedly—

Mr. COX of Tennessee (interrupting). I am not talking about that; I want your views as to our authority.

Mr. MCCREARY. This Government has repeatedly appro-appropriated money to issue books. My friend [Mr. Cox of Tennessee] voted but a few days ago for a resolution carrying thousands of dollars to issue a book on the diseases of the horse. Congress has also made an appropriation to pay for a book on dairy farming, and many others that I could name. Surely it is not inappropriate for us to make a small appropriation in order that our business people, our progressive people, our merchants, our farmers, our laboring men shall know where the market is.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman—

Mr. McCREARY. I can not yield any more. I must get through. In that connection I desire to say that the amount for the Bureau of American Republics has been reduced in the bill to $25,000. It was done because a large number of reports, books, etc., have been sent out and it was thought we should prepare for the time when we will stop making appropriations for this Bureau.

I will add at the end of my remarks a list of the books and reports that have been printed and issued by this Bureau.

Mr. Chairman, I have already occupied the time of the committee longer than I intended. These are interesting questions; they are questions that are important to us as representatives of the people of the United States. While the appropriation is small there are vast benefits to be derived from it. I hope the members of this House will give careful consideration to appropriations, indorsed by all the members of the committee but one.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, before my friend takes his seat, do I understand him to say that all the members of the committee except myself favor these appropriations?

Mr. McCREARY. I said there was but one who voted against these appropriations in the committee. If there is any record showing that any other member of the committee was opposed to these appropriations the gentleman can refer to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I simply announced that I would reserve the right to strike them out of the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I know you did, and I excepted the gentleman from Georgia purposely from my statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. But what I mean is, that I do not like my friend to put the inference before the House that I am the only one of the committee who is not in favor of this appropriation.

Mr. McCREARY. I do not know of any other. I never heard of any other.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think you will hear.

Mr. McCREARY. I will say this much, that during the meetings of the committee, during the discussions, and up to this time, I have never met a member of the committee who was opposed to the two provisions of the bill of which I have spoken. Mr. Speaker, I want to do justice to my friend from Georgia. I believe he is perfectly sincere in the position he takes. I think he is in error. I think he is making a mistake. The Committee on Foreign Affairs did not agree with him; and I hope and believe the members of the House of Representatives will not agree with him as regards the two items of the appropriation bill which have been discussed.

No extra allowance is made for the minister's personal expenses of representation (rent, housekeeping, etc.). An allowance for "voyage" (outfit) is made at the beginning of each envoy's service. It is repeated every four years that he remains at the same post. Half this sum is allowed for the home "voyage" on quitting a mission. Contingencies are allowed. A secretary is attached to each legation; in Washington there are six secretaries. The legation building in Washington is owned by the Mexican Government.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, before this general debate closes I will make a few practical observations upon the bill, strictly upon the bill itself, and chiefly in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], chairman of the committee, and as to the special provisions in which this appropriation bill depart from the existing law providing for the consular and diplomatic service. He stated that these changes were made in obedience to the sentiment—to the "mandate," I think was his word—which controls the majority in the House. Retrenchment, reduction of expenditures, or of appropriations, is required. That gentleman is an experienced member of the House, a man of personal ability, and in these changes he undoubtedly did the best that an able man could do in discharging a new task.

If on examination these changes plainly appear to be injurious to the public interest, it will strikingly prove how moderate in extent and modest in payment our foreign service is to-day. To arbitrarily change a branch of the public service, to reduce it 25 per cent, 20, or even 10 per cent, without doing harm, is a hard task. It has been attempted before. This annual bill was prepared and reported by my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] when he was chairman in a former Congress, and he examined the service with great strictness and scrutinized it with a severe eye in all its parts. He found, after very intelligent study, that he could not reduce the service and the compensation without detriment to trade, to revenue, and to our interests everywhere. The bill then passed is substantially the present law. It is difficult to make retrenchment in a service which is already inadequate. It is very difficult to reduce the cost of a service which is already too meagerly paid. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has here tried it.

The gentleman spoke of the large reduction, amounting in all to $25,000, made in the diplomatic service. It is done in a very simple way, by cutting down, consolidating, and suppressing missions. Why? On what rule? There is little explanation given in the remarks of the gentleman, and none in the report. He reduces the salaries of the consular service. Why? and how? By what rule? There is little information on this in the report, or in his remarks, except his observation that the consular posts were to be measured by the consular fees in their importance and value, by the amount of fees collected at each. There is a fee of $2.50 collected by the consul and sent to the Treasury on every invoice of goods sent to the United States from that place. That is his test. I can easily show how deceptive and illusory it is.

Where are his economies? Four or five missions are cut off. The five largest consulates are reduced each $1,000. Forty-three are cut off $500 each—all alike. A very simple method of retrenchment. No great knowledge of this complex service is required for such reform—only to know enough arithmetic to do a sum in subtraction. Twelve of them are reduced $500, from $1,500 to $1,000; ten consulates are cut off altogether from salary and left to the fees, in some cases less than a hundred dollars; so that all this part of the service will have to be filled by foreigners, as no American will go out for them. The gentleman regretted that he could not go further, and thought that a more perfect bill would sweep away the larger part of the diplomatic service and consolidate the missions to the great powers, sending one minister who could journey about Europe from capital to capital as questions arose.

I listened to that remark from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs with some surprise.

Ministers are the necessary and regular channels of communication between governments. Their powers and duties are fixed by the long-existing general assent forming the law of nations. No better scheme has yet been discovered for the dispatch of international affairs.

There is—

no legal obligation to send or to receive public ministers, but international assent to the system for a long period of time has given to the custom the force of an obligation upon all civilized powers, and it can not be abandoned without the assent of nations.

The abrupt withdrawal of a minister and discontinuance of a mission without cause is an expression of diminished regard that is close upon an affront. The same is true in a less degree of the lowering in grade and pay of a minister accredited to a friendly country. It should be done with care, with regard to the past and the future. How is it done here?

The gentleman who has just spoken cited some of the ancient precedents, awakened the memories of honors achieved in the past, and the principles that had guided our foreign policy which were the special property of the Democratic party. Let me recall one of them. He invoked the great name of Monroe and the Monroe doctrine. How is it applied here? The first step in this bill is to cut down the mission at Venezuela at this momentous hour for that unhappy republic, when a great European power, England, taking advantage of her weakness and dissensions, has seized upon a portion of Venezuela larger than the State of Pennsylvania. Yes, at this very time, in defiance of the Monroe doctrine, a European monarchy is colonizing a wide, rich, valuable region on the American continent, wresting it from our sister republic and converting it from republican to monarchical government. Instead of sympathy or even respect for the despoiled republic, we show our cold contempt for her falling power by lowering the mission, but keep on making speeches about the Monroe doctrine and retrenchment!

The reduction of a diplomatic post, I repeat, is invariably regarded by the Government to whom the minister is accredited as an expression of want of esteem. The discontinuance of a minister is very nearly a mark of open unfriendliness. Gentlemen have noticed in the newspapers within a few days a proposition made in the Chilean Congress to discontinue their minister here; and it was instantly answered that this would be an insult to the United States, and that whatever might be the feeling prevailing among the Chilean people, it ought not to be done by the Government. The members of that Congress know full as well as the learned chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the meaning of every act of international intercourse, as long since established by the usages fixing the relations of nations. The Venezuelans in their great trouble know it too and will judge us by it.

The gentleman made some criticisms touching the uselessness of ministers abroad, of whom we hear so little in achievements, such as he would deem great or useful. Let me suggest to the honorable gentlemen around me, who are public men, familiar with public business, that it is not in sensational paragraphs, not in the clamor of the newspapers, not the public anxiety that comes with the disturbance of the relations between peoples that you find most frequent or convincing evidence of the ability of a diplomatic officer. It is his task to prudently secure the peaceful flow of their relations, to watch, and promptly, quietly adjust each rising cause of trouble. There is the test of vigilance and skill. The continued peace and repose of nations is the daily triumph of wise, watchful ministers and statesmen. That story of most useful and honorable effort is often a story of each difficulty met as it rises, met in advance, and closed.

The gentleman thought it a subject of amusement to speak of the minister at Berlin as having done nothing better than negotiate an extradition treaty and remove the pork prohibition. That minister was long a distinguished member of this House.

It is possible that some local influence—

Mr. STORER. I hope we shall have order. It is almost impossible on this side to hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. It is complained that the gentleman can not be heard.

Mr. HITT. It is possible, Mr. Chairman, that we are all of us affected in our opinions of the importance of events and measures by their importance to our own localities. There are many gentlemen here who would think it a matter of great importance to remove an absolute prohibition of the introduction of cotton into England. It has been for years a question of importance to several great States in this country to remove the absolute barrier that has long existed in some great European countries to the introduction of American pork; a commerce that sent from this country over $100,000,000 worth of pork in a single year before the prohibition.

That question may be trivial and mirthful to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], but it concerns the comfort, welfare, and prosperity of many thousands of our farmers, of many millions of our people; and a minister who has succeeded, like Mr. Phelps in Germany and Mr. Reid in France, in removing that costly obstacle has performed for his country a valuable and, I think, a most honorable service.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unaware of the fact that I am speaking of a body of public servants who are not popular. They are believed to wear good clothes and often meet people with titles. They have been the favorite subjects of a certain cheap form of wit in the debate upon this bill in times past. I have not heard as much of it as usual to-day.

The State Department is usually included in this pleasantry. The gentleman [Mr. BLOUNT] referred to the "mystery" that hangs around that Department. My impression is that the chief part of the mystery that hangs about information on subjects connected with that Department comes from the fact that we are ignorant of, because of our want of interest in it and distaste for it, and so we do not take the trouble to read the voluminous reports that are accessible to all. They are not interesting because the subjects and the men do not concern our districts. A postmaster is a great deal more important in certain contingencies than a far away consul or minister. [Laughter.] It is easy to attack or ridicule him, or be economical at his expense, and it is safe for election purposes.

The consolidation of missions was thought to be a good method of economy by the gentleman who framed this bill. I have little to say on that subject except this—there must be somewhere a seat for each mission, even an itinerant peregrinating minister, a place for the archives and a residence for the minister and his family. They can not be always on the road. The gentleman has united in this bill missions to countries that in some places lie contiguous, but not conveniently so. For example, he has united Ecuador and Colombia. The minister must of course reside at one place or the other, and if he has a residence in one place he must visit the other; and he certainly ought to go at least once a year. Now, as a bird flies the distance from the capital of Colombia, Bogota to Quito, the capital of Ecuador, is perhaps not more than 500 miles. But no human being ever made the journey by that route. No bird can traverse it. It would be through and over a tumbling mass of the loftiest and most impassable mountains upon the American continent. In making his journey the minister must start from Bogota upon a mule, and, after descending the mountains to the headwaters of the Magdalena, he must descend it for many hundred miles by boat until he reaches Sabanilla. There he must take an ocean steamer to Colon. Then he must take a railway to the Pacific coast.

From there he must take another steamer until he reaches Guayaquil. Then he must equip himself again for a mountain ride into the interior of many days in length. This series of journeys ordinarily requires about eighty days. I know of no instance in the reports where anyone has made that route in less than sixty days, and it is highly probable that it would take the minister ninety days, and he could not take his family with him without great difficulty and exorbitant outlay. Then to return would take as long. Why, Mr. Chairman, you could leave the chair where you now sit, go clear around the world and come back here before that minister could leave one of the capitals to which he is accredited and reach the other. [Laughter.] That illustrates the convenient manner in which these missions have been consolidated.

When that minister turned back and reached his regular post where he had left his family, at the place of his residence, half the year would have gone by—certainly that much time would have elapsed if he had made any stay at his other post. We would, therefore, be really accrediting him to be upon the road the larger part of the year, but not a dollar is provided in the bill for such long and expensive journeys. His dispatches would be for the most part souvenirs of travel. [Laughter.]

There are in the bill other cases of consolidation made with a singular disregard of the actual condition of affairs. What is a minister sent abroad for? He is sent to watch and to wait. In an hour his best and highest services may be required and may be of transcendent importance on a question that might involve to us an expenditure of trouble, of blood, or of money in international conflict, far surpassing all the little cost that is provided for in this whole bill. Every one can recall such crises suddenly arising.

Take the Central American missions. Those five little Central American states have been divided in their ambitions and struggles for the last twenty-five years. The two on the north, Guatemala and Honduras, have always been together in their aims and purposes; and the other three, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and Salvador, have likewise been associated together against them.

In the last Congress our committee very wisely provided that we should send a minister to the two states on the north and another to the three on the south, thus, for economy, consolidating three friendly states in the one case and two in the other. But this bill, by an ingenuity that is difficult to explain, takes Honduras from beside its old friend, Guatemala, and unites it with states which it most cordially dislikes, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and Salvador. Again I ask, what is a minister sent for? His duty is to make himself acceptable, to become acquainted with public men, to do and to say nothing to make himself disagreeable to the powers where he is, for he is there to secure every possible advantage for us. Now, any expression or action on the part of our minister showing cordiality towards Honduras will tend to destroy his influence and usefulness in the other states. Any evidence that he has shown a warm interest in public men when he was at one capital will make him unwelcome in the other when he returns.

Again, across the water there is a case of economy by consolidation provided in this bill. Denmark is united to Sweden and Norway; in other words, the mission to Denmark is abolished, for that will be the result of it. In this country are many Danes who have come here as immigrants, and many of them after becoming American citizens return to visit their old homes and relatives. Questions of their personal rights are constantly arising among those, and we should have a minister there. The other day there occurred an event to which the honorable chairman of the committee referred, the passage of a bill through the Danish Parliament appropriating 250,000 crowns for an exhibit and representation at our great international fair at Chicago. After it had passed both Houses the telegraphic news to the London papers and to the press of Europe gave them word that this bill had been reported abolishing the mission to Denmark.

Now, that is not a mere incident concerning us only; it is an act so far from friendly, an expression of want of esteem so marked, that no monarchical government will pass it by. The Executive took notice of it. The honorable gentleman from Georgia spoke of some communication to him about this from the American minister. I know nothing of that. But another minister called attention to it. The minister I refer to is the Danish minister to Washington, Count de Sponneck. He stated, not in the least tone or spirit of threat, but simply as the communication of a fact, that this expressive action from a government that heretofore has been friendly, coming at this moment, would probably cause his Government to pause long before any further action was taken upon the project of sending the large and costly Danish exhibit to the United States. It is but natural. We would resent such a thing most promptly. Were the English Government to reduce its envoy here in grade to a mere minister resident, every newspaper in the United States would promptly utter the public resentment at an insulting implication that the United States was not a great power and of little consequence among nations. Denmark is a country of diminished territory—with an ancient and glorious history of which she is justly proud; and to select her as a mark of diminished regard on our part is not wise. Denmark was the second country in Europe to rescind the prohibition on American pork and her action had a wide influence. But that is the line taken here for retrenchment. I think it most unfortunate and inopportune.

Without going over further details of this part of the bill, I pass now to the consular system. My friend from Georgia said something of its history, its extent, and its utility. Let me recall another thing to your attention; it is like the postal service; it does not cost the people anything from the Treasury or in taxes, for, by the fees collected through the consuls, it puts back into the Treasury all that Congress votes out for the support of the service and a great deal more. Until the passage of the Dingley bill a few years ago, affecting the fees which had been received in the matter of shipping seamen, there was a large surplus, to diminish which that bill was very properly enacted.

This service is the one selected as the special mark for this ill-advised retrenchment. The gentleman said in his report, and the substance of it was in his speech—I noted his remark, for I am careful not to do him injustice—

As the offices increase in importance they become of greater value, requiring men of more ability, to obtain whom we must offer higher compensation.

Carrying out that idea, he selected the five largest offices in the whole service and reduced the compensation of each $1,000! These are London, Liverpool, Paris, Havana, and Rio Janeiro.

The honorable chairman said in various forms of expression, put with more force than I can repeat, that the importance of the office was indicated by the fees registered. He has been much engrossed with other and great duties in this House, else it would not have escaped his attention (for there is nothing else that would have kept him from informing himself of it) that the collection of fees is the last duty of the consul, not the first.

A consular system was organized all over the world five hundred years before there was any such duty assigned to consuls as the collection of fees for invoices—centuries before invoices were ever heard of. Their primary duty is to protect their countrymen. Men are more important than dollars. Our consuls are the shield of the American citizen wherever he goes all round the world. We have a revenue system peculiar to ourselves by which the great part of the Government income is from import duties, and under it the consular officers in verifying the invoices of goods sent to this country become the sentinels of the Treasury. It is a very important function, and the amount of the fees returned does in many cases indicate to a certain extent the volume of business passing through the office, as each invoice pays a fee of $2.50.

But I know from my own experience in the Department of State and from observation at the posts I have seen, that this is one of the most imperfect indices of the importance of a post. The gentleman selected the whole body of the consuls in China for reduction—every one of them. For what reason? Manifestly because the fees opposite the names of the consulates were not great in amount. My attention was drawn to this matter a long time ago when I was an officer of the State Department; and with the view of cutting down some of the salaries, I had an inquiry made as to the cost of living, the difficulty of transit, and the amount of business, etc., and I was satisfied that they were not too high.

Look at these fees. They are very trivial in amount—why? An invoice in the China trade which yields a fee of $2.50 may cover $120,000 worth of goods—a whole cargo. Amoy makes a very small figure in the list of fees—only $1,028. The imports from Amoy amounted, however, during the last year to the vast sum of $5,103,817. An invoice in a German or French port may represent $25 or $50 worth of goods.

Consulates in Cuba are also selected for this retrenchment. For example, a reduction is proposed at Cardenas. The fees at Cardenas during the last year were $447.50. But do those figures inform you of the business of that consulate—the volume and importance of its work?

I will not weary the House with details on this matter, but let me give this illustration: The consul at Cardenas last year had to look after 139 American vessels arriving, with 2,234 seamen, and 124 vessels departing, with 2,213 seamen. This implies an immense labor, custody, and certification of the ships' papers, shipment and discharge of seamen, hunting up deserters, disposition of effects of seamen deceased, settling disputes among crews, etc. in value to $332,000—nearly all dutiable goods. The officer who The invoices, though there were only about 180 of them, amounted does all this is to live with his family in that pestilential Cuban coast on $1,000 a year.

When there pass through a consul's hands goods subject to a very high duty, such as those leaving the port of Havre or Lyons, France, the consul must be most vigilant, because the merchant has every interest in giving a low value in order to escape the high duty here. The duty on those French goods averages 60 per cent or more, they being nearly all luxuries, upon which even our Democratic friends have always joined in levying a high tariff.

Now, a consul at such a port should be a man above any improper influence. He is obliged to employ experts; the State Department is obliged sometimes to make him allowances of money in order that he may employ a man who will disclose the true value of the goods. Do not be surprised when I say that he can not find the value of the goods by simply looking over the price lists. They often have no relation to current prices at all. Why, there are towns in Germany and in France where there are large manufacturing establishments which make their goods for the United States market alone. They have no quoted price lists whatever, and you can not discover their value except by having an expert to examine them upon the ground, who knows the cost of the material, the value of the labor, and the value of the capital invested; and that is one of the duties of the consuls all the time, to watch just such establishments.

The duties of consuls are very complex and depend upon location largely, so that you can tell nothing whatever of them by reading the provision of the law in reference to them, or the list of officers and the fees returned by each. Now, here is Gaspé Basin, where we have a consul, far on the northeast, and one at Port Stanley, Falkland Islands, a place which it would cost a year's salary to reach, in a dreary, inhospitable place, almost a prison. The consul there gets $1,000. Here are a dozen places in this list, remote and scarcely known, ports frequented by our ships, where seamen are relieved, where great multitudes of our poor sailors go. Gaspé Basin is a dreary place, far away up to the north, the farthest point towards Labrador. We have our consul there, and he is always complaining and trying to get transferred to some place where a human being can find some share in the joys of living.

In this reform of the service, which is a curious reform, are ten of these officers, who receive now only $1,000, and who are cut off from all salary and reduced to the fees they may collect. Will you bethink yourselves one moment, gentlemen, of the consequences? What will be the result of this action? There is not an American citizen who will hold one of these consular offices after this bill goes into effect. All of your consular appointments of that class will go to foreigners, and under such circumstances they generally go to a merchant; some intelligent merchant, if he can be found, who is interested, however, against us, whose allegiance is to another government, and he interested perhaps in a Manchester house.

Here is a long list of consuls that are reduced from fifteen hundred to twelve hundred dollars, which I will not take up the time of the committee to read. Shall I suggest to you one of the consequences of that change? When a consul is paid but $1,000 (and it is known that he cannot live on that meager salary) he is allowed by our law to trade. Any officer receiving that salary can trade. In what? Why, he will trade in the things that are wanted.

Suppose he is at some port where our poor sailors go for relief; then he will trade in sailors' supplies, and the more he is tempted to plunder these poor creatures the more it will add to his compensation. Every dollar he makes beyond his salary is of course clear gain to him. Worse than that, if there could be anything worse than the wrong done to the seamen, who are our fellow citizens, he is, we will suppose, in a particular line of trade. This is the man also who inspects the invoices and verifies them, and with others inspects his own. He is a foreigner and a merchant, for you can not get an American to take the appointment. He inspects his own invoices; he is the policeman of the Government appointed to watch himself. He is our sentinel put there to protect the Treasury from fraud, and he is himself the man to be watched.

Added to this is the fact that every other merchant in the place is forced to bring his invoices to him and submit them and all the secrets of his business to a rival. We put an official spy there, and compel every other merchant to put his business under his rival's eye. And remember, he is a man not subject to our laws; he has no affection nor respect for this Government; he owes his allegiance elsewhere, and is possibly interested with some other establishment engaged in business in England, France, or Germany. In some of these places the amount of the importations is large, and the loss to the Treasury in some cases will certainly be high. I could give you many facts, but I will not weary the House by going into these matters in detail. The loss to the Treasury from such unfortunate changes has in all cases heretofore been great, and the economy proposed in this case is $500.

I am reluctant, Mr. Chairman, to hold the House longer upon these particulars, which I know have such limited interest to gentlemen; the subject is so far away, so remote from our lives here. But let me speak for a moment of the classes that seem to be in the eye of the honorable gentleman who drew the bill. He spoke of useless consulates and he made a reference during his remarks, which I thought a most unfortunate one, to Athens as an example of a useless consulate, where the fees, he said, were only $5.40, and which had been properly reduced because of its want of importance. Incidentally I may remark that there was a slight error in his statement of the fees, for there is a town—Piræus—which is really a suburb of Athens, in sight of it, and is the port of the town, quite easy of access—I have walked there myself for a morning walk—and at this town over $200 were collected from fees. But it is but a small part of the duty to collect fees at that point.

Athens has another sort of value as a consulate; it is the convergent point of travel in the East, and Americans land there, sometimes 80 or 100 in a day. They are an estimable class of people. They are not nonresident Americans, but they are serious people, upon the most enlightened purpose that a man can pursue. That country is one of primitive civilization largely, and there is more often occasion for inquiry, for advice, for protection, than in a country like France or England—twenty times oftener. The gentleman now consul there is, I understand, an able man, an accomplished scholar. I have seen repeated commendation of him. He is, I believe, a distinguished gentleman from Iowa who was induced to take that place because of reasons that are known to himself—probably because his thoughtful mind clothed it in the light of great historic events and associations.

I have heard members of the House who have been there speak of his ability and efficiency in cases where he had well performed that duty to his countrymen which is the primary purpose in the appointment of consuls. Now, his pay is not very great. It is so meager that he has not been able to leave his post during the long burning heats of the summer. He is marked in this bill for a reduction of $500. Reference has been made here to the need of a minister to Greece. The mission to Roumania, Servia, and Greece is one of the peregrinating missions, and the minister only goes there for a few weeks or months when the weather makes it permissible; but this consul is the one who does continuous work; he stays there through the whole year.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does not the minister now make his residence at Athens?

Mr. HITT. I am not able to state whether he does or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is my information.

Mr. HITT. I know from a letter which was handed to me to-day, from a resident, that he is not there the greater part of the year.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman will find that he resides there now. Excuse the interruption.

Mr. HITT. Certainly. I am glad to be corrected in any particular. The minister has three capitals or courts which he is required to attend, and he is on the march a good deal of the time.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I think his residence is at Athens.

Mr. HITT. You mean he has a house there?

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HITT. Reference has been made here to St. Helena. St. Helena is not a place of large manufactures, and there is no great return of fees, but it is a place where many a poor sailor comes, where many a ship stops. The disputes of these sailors, their discharge, their protection, the settling of their affairs and the remitting of their effects when they are dead, the custody and certification of ships' papers, all these things fall upon this meagerly paid consul on this lonely, dreary island. If you wanted to find the most important of all the consulates, and followed the chairman's rule of judging by fees, you would go to the large European cities, to these German manufacturing towns where invoices cover small amounts and the fees are so great. But the Department knows better, and they are given very moderate salaries, and very properly so.

What is the moral of all this? It is that not even as skillful a gentleman as the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] can sit down without preparation, and touch this service, which is so many sided, which involves so many duties, which has been built up so slowly, can not touch it with a knife to cut away without bringing blood. He must be familiar with the service or he will mar all he touches. The recommendations of a Democratic Secretary of State are the same as the recommendations of a Republican, when he is in that Department. Mr. Bayard's estimates are substantially the same as those that were cited by the gentleman from Georgia as a matter of reproach.

When you are familiar with each post, when you have studied their interests, when you have seen their duties, when you have watched the services of the man, you can learn where there should be diminution and where there should be increase, but you can not tell it from a list. I think that this cutting down, especially these poor, humble officers, is inadvisable. I care not so much for their personal welfare. We are all too patriotic to care anything about the personal welfare of officeholders. That does not concern us. We will be patriotic whatever it costs them [laughter]. But the service is of great public importance. We are making it inefficient for its true purpose. This will put a long list of foreigners in office in place of Americans. It will place foreigners in every one of these posts where they are to be paid the small amount of fees. In all the consular offices in Greece there is to-day but one American, the man marked by this bill for diminution of pay. The rest of them are Greeks and Britons. You can not get anybody else to take the smaller offices.

I fear the House is weary with the discussion of particulars. I have only desired to indicate as briefly as I can practically the objections which arise in my mind, and which I think each of you gentlemen of the House will at once see and appreciate. No matter what our party, we are all Americans. This service is our service. It does not concern one part of our country, and we would alike agree, I am sure, if we were executive officers, in preserving the efficiency of the service, in keeping it up at least to its present status. Every Secretary has recommended its enlargement as the country and its commerce, and the movements of our countrymen have enlarged. In the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] reference was made, both by him and his questioners, to the rapid enlargement of commerce of the South and elsewhere.

Right there is the function of the consul, though it is often ignorantly exaggerated. A consul can not make people trade. A consul does not lead people to embark in any particular enterprises; but if he is a practical, active, vigilant man, and intelligently attends to his duty, he will send valuable practical information home to be given to our people who may desire to be put in communication with those with whom they can profitably trade. I think that any one who will read the consular reports will be readily convinced of the intelligence and ability of these officers: there you will see the value of intelligence in such an office. When you lower the pay of the office you cheapen the man. You can not get as able, intelligent, and vigilant a man for $1,000 or $1,500 as you can for $2,000 or $3,000.

Mr. LYNCH. Are there any fees connected with these offices, the salaries of which are reduced by this bill?

Mr. HITT. You mean fees that go to them personally? Of the fees received by the consuls in these salaried offices that are reduced, not a dollar is received by them. I will state for the information of the gentleman who honors me with his attention, that fees and feed offices are frequently referred to in the newspapers as a kind of a gold mine.

There are, in fact, four or five great offices in the consular service, where, owing to the number of American citizens traveling and sojourning there, who have occasion for personal service, the consul is employed for their private business, especially drawing papers; and when he performs that duty, which is wholly voluntary and not official, they pay him for it. And if a lawyer were next door to the consul he might get that business. Nearly every American who is long in a foreign country may need some legal services, and preferring some one on whom he can rely, he goes generally to our consul, as a responsible and respectable man of intelligence. If the gentleman who asks the question were abroad and were extremely ill he would probably ask the consul to draw his will, not a French nor Spanish lawyer.

Then if the consul gave you his time and trouble he will be paid for it. In the great consulates of London and Paris, and in some degree at two or three other posts, there is much of this business, wills, deeds, power of attorney, etc. In most consulates there are none to speak of. The notarial fees are not large in amount, except in two. They are all reported to the State Department. Besides these, official fees are collected in all consulates and sent to the Treasury.

Mr. LYNCH. Is there any official fee?

Mr. HITT. For the consul? When the consul has no salary at all he keeps all the official fees. They are at posts where the fees are small in amount.

Mr. LYNCH. Are there not fees in connection with the salary?

Mr. HITT. When a consul is not salaried he is allowed the fees, retaining them up to a certain point; but he can not keep them beyond $2,500.

Mr. LYNCH. Is he not allowed fees outside of his salary?

Mr. HITT. Nothing whatever if he is salaried. He must get on with the salary. A man who is appointed consul at Ceylon under this bill would receive $1,000; but see what it would cost him to take his family and himself, perhaps from Kansas to Ceylon; and if he were to be removed soon you can estimate what this man, who would only receive a thousand dollars a year, would make after paying the cost of going and returning were he to escape death from pestilence or accident in going to the Antipodes and returning.

Some of these officers selected for reduction are at places where the pay is apparently large. There is Colon, for instance: It is a detestable town on the Isthmus of Darien. Eight consuls have perished there of yellow fever within the past twenty-five years. One just died and his successor was appointed to-day. The consul at Colon gets $3,000 a year; but it is a very costly place to live, and a post of actual personal danger. Now, that man has to keep a kind of post-office. He has to get up at midnight so as to be able to meet the steamer. He has to distribute the mails for the Pacific coast. It is also a naval station, and he is in some degree a dispatch agency. He is placed where there are multitudes of sailors coming and going, and if a sailor is in trouble the consul is the man who has to look after him. You can not tell what the duties of a consulate are unless you inquire specially as to the facts of the post, its situation, its cost of living, etc.

The mission to Venezuela has been selected for reduction. Now, the place where the minister has to live is Caracas. That is said to be the most expensive place of residence on the American continent. Everything has to be carried by animals up a long ascent. It is a place where everything almost that is necessary to civilized man, and to Americans, has to be bought at large cost. The capital is at Caracas. The minister has to appear decently dressed, not necessarily in finery for balls and court ceremonies and in all the splendor that the gentleman from Georgia described, but he has to dress and bear himself just as the gentleman from Georgia does as we see him in his daily walk, and he could not do that with a family on $5,000 a year in Caracas.

I do not know that my remarks can convince anyone present of the propriety of changing the bill back to the terms of the present statute, which received the approval of the committee last year: that statute which, in nearly all its parts, came from the skillful hand or received the imprimatur of the veteran from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], who sits behind me. If you gentlemen are constrained, by some "mandate" given out and enacted I know not where, to cut down the service—to make an economy of 20 or 25 per cent—I do not suppose that anything I can say will change the result.

But, knowing the character of the gentlemen in this House, that their titles are not given to them in satire, but that they are "honorable" men, I have made this short appeal to them on behalf of a body of men scattered around the world, with whom I was at one time in some degree associated, as I was the executive officer of the Department of State, and was thus led to know of their wants, their business, their sorrows resulting from residence abroad, amid trying duties, with meager pay, far from friends or support.

Take China, with the apparently good salaries. I have known cases where men have gone there with families, induced, probably, by the apparently large salaries, to meet nothing but a life of continuous struggle, effort, and final failure. Perhaps this reduction of the pay of the service in China may be followed by a still greater reduction, for we passed through this House the other day a bill which, if it should become a law, would save the whole cost of all the consuls in China as well as the mission, as they would all have to be immediately abandoned.

But we are practical men—all of us—Democrats and Republicans. We want to have an efficient service. There is something else to do beside making a political record of economy, hoping that our action will be changed in the Senate and that the service will be saved unimpaired. There is not one of the gentlemen whom I look upon who does not want to see our commerce promoted, our revenues protected, and, more than that, far more, that the American citizens everywhere shall be protected and cared for by officers of this Government, who are upright, who are intelligent, who are fit representatives of the United States. They are to care for our greatest and most precious treasure, the rights of the American citizen.

Why, sir, Mr. Pendleton, who has been mentioned to-day, as an American minister worthy of all credit, tried hard to have a bill passed through the Senate that would stop the practice of appointing foreigners as American consuls, but have salaried Americans everywhere, as no American should be compelled to seek protection from a foreigner clothed by our Government with authority as its representative, yet himself owing allegiance to some King. Mr. Frelinghuysen, as fair a gentleman as ever presided over the State Department, sent a document to Congress recommending a still broader measure, upon the ground that the highest interest of this Government was to protect its citizens. Believe me, it pays, gentlemen. It is not mere sentiment. The British do it, and they are a wise people.

A British consul and eleven men were insulted, maltreated, and imprisoned by a barbarous king, who defied Great Britain. Swiftly her armed men from the four corners of the earth penetrated to his capital fastness far in the interior of Africa, burned his city, stormed the fortress, slew him in his palace—all to rescue that little handful of Englishmen. The prestige of that honorable action by a proud and powerful people gave to all the hundreds of millions throughout the vast Orient the memorable, terrible lesson that no spot was so remote where Englishmen were insulted and stricken down but unrelenting vengeance would come, cost what it might, though it be armies and fleets and hundreds of millions of treasure.

I believe in a service that will, as far as possible, within the bounds of that economy ever characteristic of this House, maintain everywhere fit representatives for the protection of Americans who journey in other lands, the men who press aggressively the outward boundaries of our commerce, extending everywhere our trade. We want a consular service which they can rely upon and find ever ready to protect them promptly and efficiently, a service that will practically guard the interests of the Treasury, a service that will care for our shipping interests and protect our seamen, a service that will be to us in the future, as in the past, efficient, but I hope a great deal more extended, as every Secretary has recommended for thirty years; and I would be glad if this House, instead of cutting down and mutilating that service, would provide for it more liberally, with that care and diligence due to economy, but at the same time worthy of the spirit of Congress legislating for this great nation. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Chairman, during his very able and very happy speech the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] alluded to the appropriation for China, and as to what our probable relations with that empire will be. Unquestionably that is a matter of importance. We are making appropriations in this bill to defray the expenses of our legations; and it is a proper time to consider of what use our legation will be in that country. I do not propose in what I say to-day to indulge in any cheap abuse of the Chinese people. I shall admit the ingenuity, the learning, and the ability of great masses of them. I shall admit, too, their right to be treated in international law with fairness and with entire justice. And yet, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter which concerns us very much to know whether we are standing upon safe ground with that empire.

When gentlemen invoke the faith of treaties here my heart and my understanding alike respond promptly and fully to the appeal. The faith, however, which belongs to treaties is not a mere sentimental one. There is very little which concerns the government of men, or at least the relations of one nation to another, which is, or safely can be, of a sentimental character. To observe a treaty simply because it is a treaty, to do certain things under it simply because it is provided that certain things may be done or shall be done, is not in the broad light of modern civilization sufficient to satisfy the understanding of intelligent men. We may at least ask by what authority was the treaty made? Was it ultra vires as to the officers making it?

In our position as a constitutional government questions of a most delicate and serious nature arise in regard to the treaty-making power. Questions, too, which are common to us with all civilized men, force themselves upon us for consideration. The treaty-making power in this country is subject to the Constitution exactly as any other power known to the Government. This is no new doctrine upon my part. It has been affirmed by the most distinguished of our Secretaries of State, by others of our renowned statesmen, and by the Supreme Court of the United States itself. And the idea that, because the Constitution prescribes that a treaty is the supreme law of the land, it therefore overrides institutions and statutes is not well-founded.

The slightest investigation of the subject must at once lead anyone to say that like all other powers under our Government, the treaty-making power is restricted by its collocation with other powers. Does anybody dream that the Senate and the President in making a treaty could give a monopoly of any branch of trade to the subjects of any nation within this country, or that by a treaty a direct appropriation could be made out of the Treasury? Would it be for an instant contended that under the guise of the treaty-making power taxes might be imposed upon the country and tariffs laid?

Will anybody contend that under the guise of the treaty-making power a uniform system of naturalization might be established through the length and breadth of the land? Why, Mr. Chairman, this power, like all other powers of the Government, is limited and restricted, subservient to the general scope of the Constitution and to the division of powers between the coordinate branches of the Government. Congress alone may regulate commerce; Congress alone has the power to tax; Congress alone may prescribe a uniform rule of naturalization. In these matters the Congress—not the President and the Senate, but the Congress—is the constitutional power; and the President and the Senate can not be permitted, and are not permitted under the Constitution, to do that which might virtually change the form of your Government and ignore the power of the lawmaking body of this country.

Need I dwell upon this? Does it require amplification? Does it need citations of precedents? Have we learned the lesson of constitutional liberty to so little purpose that elaborate argument is necessary to establish that proposition? So, then, Mr. Chairman, treaties must be within the Constitution. If they go beyond that, they are not binding upon the honor, upon the consciences, or upon the action of this people.

Take the treaty with China. We are told that we have certain obligations toward that empire. I admit it. We are told, however, in effect that those obligations are perpetual, because by the terms of the treaty and of all the treaties (three or four in number) which we have with that power, no limit is fixed to their duration.

In many of our treaties it is provided that they shall cease within ten or twelve years, or some other defined period, after notice is given by one of the powers of its abrogation. In a case of that kind there is strength—not conclusive force but strength—in an argument that you must abide by the treaty at least until it expires by its own terms. But here is a treaty specifying no limitation as to time. Is this binding for this generation, and for all generations, upon the American people? Is this treaty a mortgage and a burden upon our industry and our prosperity forever?

Will any one say that such a treaty can not be abrogated? Is that good sense, or is it not the patent, the logical, the proper construction of an instrument of this character that it is practically and entirely an agreement at the will of the parties to it, and that either or both, in this instance as in other instances of contracts at will familiar to the law, may abrogate it. Why shall they not? Why shall not a treaty of that kind be always considered as made with that understanding? Circumstances alter; the conditions of peoples alter; the progress of civilization compels great changes. That which is good to-day may be evil a year from now. That which is a blessing and a benefit to-day may be a hundred years hence a curse, an unbearable burden upon our children.

It is in vain, it is worse than a sentimentality, to say that any nation can put such a yoke upon itself and that all the children of men born in this country for centuries to come (for that is the logic of the argument) are bound by the terms and conditions of the treaty with China.

That treaty was founded on a barren idealism in the very beginning. It was a burst of that sentiment which leads us to believe that all the world are anxious to come here and to live among us as one common people—that sentiment and a more selfish sentiment which desired cheap labor. That treaty talks of the "inalienable rights of men to change their residence and their allegiance," when no Chinaman desires, or ever desired, to change either the one or the other, and when, in the sense of what experience has taught us we have no desire that they shall change either the one or the other.

The treaty, then, with China, Mr. Chairman, being a perpetual one, making provision for something which the Chinese people as a people do not wish or desire, and having for its keynote an idea which can never be accomplished, owing to the peculiarities of that people, can not in the very nature of things be forever binding upon us. It is utterly impossible. It is a dream which fades in the light of sense.

Why, sir, think of it for a moment. Can the treaty-making power bind this nation perpetually, or can it be so bound except by conquest? And conquest always means the right of reclamation with returning strength. It can not by treaty take away from you your homes or your liberty or any of your sacred rights; but under the guise of a Chinese treaty it essays to give up the industries of the country, or, at least, to share them, and to open to an alien race all the pursuits by which the people seek to live and which they are entitled to enjoy to the exclusion of all others. I affirm there is no power to do this.

Is this the assertion of a fallacy or is it a reasonable doctrine? Is it an uncharitable doctrine, or is it the doctrine that charity begins at home? Why, Mr. Chairman, I have in my pocket an address from the Federation of Labor of America to the Fifty-second Congress, in which they complain in that address that at least a million of people in this country to-day can not find employment, and that many others can only find partial employment. Is that true? Who gainsays it? Does anyone know more about it than these people, these laborers who framed this address, and who seek relief at our hands? Is not their testimony conclusive on the subject?

But, even if it is not conclusive, I appeal to gentlemen, whether, when such a cry as that comes up to us here, it is not time to ascertain where, if the evil really exists, where the remedy is to be found, and whether after all a treaty is a more sacred thing than the flesh and blood of your own people? Treaties are made for the benefit of nations; they are meant to help, not to burden, not to be fetters, but facilities for national progress. We have come to a stage in our affairs when this treaty with China is found to be a burden and a snare, a fetter to our people. What is the complaint? Is it the cheap complaint of demagogues? Is it a mere outcry of prejudice, of passion, or is it a noble aspiration for such social conditions and advancement as will maintain the decency, the comfort, and civic independence of the American people?

The complaint is against cheap labor; not the cheap labor of the Chinaman alone, but the cheap labor of the assisted emigrant; the cheap labor of the emigrant who comes here under a contract for his services; the cheap labor of the man who is a convict, who competes with honest people. It is not then as to the Chinese alone, but as to all and every form of cheap labor, against everything that tends to demoralize the social standing by reducing the wages of our people, that the protest is made. Is that right or is it wrong? If it is right then the circumstances have arisen; a condition of affairs has been reached when the rule I have laid down may be invoked, and when we may say to China without offense to her, without violating the treaty, and in consonance with the rule which should always apply to perpetual treaties, that a time has come for a change; that we must enter into other arrangements with her. It may be that there are other methods of reaching this result than the one we contemplate.

It may be that there is something valuable in this connection by treaty between this country and China, and that we must not jeopardize it by hasty action. The trade of that great country may be now, as the trade of the Orient has been in all ages, a prize worth contending for and worth keeping when it is won.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is entirely aside from this question of labor. What treaty commercial rights in all the world would be a compensation for the degradation of the labor of this country? There is no objection—there can be none—to a treaty of commerce between us and China, and I have no doubt that that is as far as the treaty-making power in time of peace can go—an arrangement by which commerce may be carried on, by which an exchange of China's products for American products may be made, but never an arrangement by which grown men may come here and compete with the women over the washtub, with the miners in the mines, with the cigar-makers in the factories, and with all our people who are laboring and struggling to make a living in the ordinary and daily occupations of life.

There is no power in any branch of this Government to mortgage the labor of the American people in perpetuity even to secure the advantages of a lucrative commerce. The workingmen desire the benefits of commerce; but deny the power to give their opportunities and their vocations as the price of it.

It does not follow, Mr. Chairman, that because we propose to withdraw the privilege—for it is not a right—to Chinese laborers to enter this country, it does not follow that we are violating a treaty with China, or that our intercourse with her must end. There is no abuse of our relations with that country when we do this. We are standing upon our reserved rights. We are standing upon the agreement, upon the fair understanding which attaches to every treaty, which purports to make perpetual terms between nations.

I know, sir, that the great part of the American people will agree with me in this. There has been criticism, unthinking and unwise, in different quarters, upon the action of this House. Our action went forth undefended, undebated. No reason was given for it here, and portions of the country have the idea that we were simply running amuck in a chase for votes and for popularity, when in fact we were endeavoring conscientiously to protect the dignity of American labor and to prevent its being overwhelmed by further additions of cheap laborers. Now, it has occurred to me that this much should be said in behalf of the action of this House. I care not what form that action takes, so long as it protects the laboring men of this country.

Continue your treaty of commerce; the only treaty, in my judgment, that the treaty-making power has capacity to enter into. Continue that, if you please. Extend the time under the Angell treaty, during which Chinese labor shall not come into the country in any form or in any shape; but do it thoroughly. Protect the laboring men of this country against the influx of cheap labor. I know that that influx is not so great as many people think, but it is great enough to be an evil; it is great enough to add 110,000 men to the ranks of breadwinners. It is great enough to suggest the possibility, to certain classes of capitalists, of cheaper labor in the future, and it is great enough, if it is not checked, to arouse the fears of every laboring man who respects himself and who loves his family. It swells the hordes of assisted immigrants, of contract immigrants, and of convict competitors to a mighty host.

I know that men who talk as I am talking now are accused of demagoguery. Let it be. I am willing to be assailed with all these high terms of diplomatic faith and of the sanctity of treaties. I am willing to endure these without retorting that the very men who talk in that way are apt to be the demagogues of capital, and are apt to be as swift in the service of capital as I am of labor. I would wish to see capital prosperous; but a capital which is prosperous and does not shed prosperity in its path, which does not make the laborer comfortable, which does not keep up his self-respect, which does not pay him wages enough to enable him to be a decent, intelligent, and useful citizen, that capital deserves no respect, and is an enemy of the people, and as such ought to be opposed.

No war between classes in this country. It is simply a question of the general decency of our people, of their general prosperity, and I think that full consideration will show every gentleman who will take the trouble to give it, that in this combat, whatever strong measures we might be tempted to take, whatever irregular steps we might be tempted to take, that the abrogation or rescission of a perpetual treaty is not a strong measure, is not an irregular measure, but is a measure of plain duty and of undoubted legal right. [Applause.]

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in opening this debate, said European countries may require able diplomats, but not so with us. He proceeded to ridicule, in a pleasant sort of way, the successes of our representatives abroad, and said the ridicule was for the purpose of showing up the magnificent ability required of our diplomats. He then proceeded to make the minister to Denmark the subject of special comment, and by no means complimentary to his service, and all because he said he had written a letter to him. It seems to me that that letter conveyed a valuable piece of information when he was providing for the union of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway in one mission. I have had no letter and no information from the minister to Denmark or any other minister, but I know something of the history of this country, and I do not agree with all the conclusions of the majority of the committee or with the report of the committee.

When the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] entered upon the eloquent defense of our diplomatic agents, I thought I need having nothing to say, but he too, it seems, had agreed to the union of several missions. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reviewed this whole question so completely that I might perhaps forego any remarks on this occasion, but I wish to enforce on one single point, the question of the union of missions, certain of his observations.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BLOUNT] suggested that we might retain, in his general abolition, the ministers to England, France, Germany, and Turkey—that they might be allowed to remain. Why? The argument which he made on this floor and the reasons assigned in the report would abolish these missions as well. He said in effect that we have no special interest in foreign countries; that our interest is centered in our internal affairs and questions of taxation. On the floor and in his report he referred to quick communication as doing away with the necessity for skilled diplomats abroad. Is not our communication with England and France as quick as it is with Russia?

Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to reduce the number of diplomatic offices by placing "Denmark, Sweden, and Norway under one mission, Colombia and Ecuador under one mission, and Peru and Bolivia under one mission. The committee suggests that—the facilities for the transmission and interchange of thought in every matter connected with foreign countries dispense with much of the need of foreign representation. It enables the home government to communicate rapidly and freely with foreign governments and to give directions in the most minute details.

To give directions to whom? Certainly not to foreign governments. So far as the statement is used to support the idea that it dispenses "with the need of foreign representation," it is misleading.

If it were the custom, if it were practicable for governments to communicate by mail or telegraph directly with each other, then foreign representation might be dispensed with. But such is not the custom, and it is probable that the world will long continue to enjoy the benefit of the services of intelligent and observing diplomatic agents who receive from their own governments confidential and detailed instructions in national affairs and controversies. If international negotiations were conducted directly between the governments by mail or telegraph every difference between nations would develop an ultimatum leading to war or at least to breaking off of intercourse.

The rapid communication to which the report refers is with our own agents who reside near the courts to which they are accredited, and instead of lessening the need of such agents it makes them all the more necessary. The convenience of rapid communication, which furnishes full information, requires prompt decision of every international dispute.

The proposition to send one minister to reside near the government at Copenhagen and at the same time to reside near the government at Stockholm is as unreasonable as it is impossible. It can not be assumed that this Government would willfully insult either of the proud nations to which it is proposed to accredit the moiety of a minister. They are independent powers accustomed to have the accredited agents of other governments residing at their capitals and to be treated with the consideration of sovereign nations. It does not appear that the President or Secretary of State, who are charged with the responsibility of our foreign relations, have suggested this measure. On the contrary, the report alleges that—

Very much might be safely done in reducing the number of our ministers by abolition or the union of several countries under one mission. Not encouraged to hope for an acceptance of their views by the Senate or the President, it has been deemed best, except in a few instances, to postpone needed reforms at this point.

It appears, therefore, that the committee propose to curtail the number of diplomatic agents which has heretofore been authorized and which the President now deems necessary to a successful conduct of our foreign affairs. The committee will find not alone the Senate and the President, but the people of the United States unwilling to accept their views. The people will hardly be willing to transfer the control of the foreign relations of our country from the executive officers who have conducted them with honor and success to those who would sacrifice to a spurious economy even the dignity of the nation.

The abolition of missions or union of several countries under one mission is spoken of as a "needed reform." During the incumbency of the Democratic Administration these missions existed, but no such reform was proposed either by the President or this House. Are these missions less important now than they were then? What reason shall we assign for an act which no foreign nation could consider friendly? How shall we explain the adoption of a policy of breaking off diplomatic intercourse by the abolition or union of missions? What is the excuse for such a course? To say that the United States could not afford to send diplomatic agents abroad according to usage would be ridiculed by everyone, even by gentlemen who suggest that idea. If it be undesirable to carry on our international intercourse in the customary manner, all that this House can do is to refuse to provide for the expenses of that branch of the public service or for any particular part of it.

Under the Constitution the President has power to appoint diplomatic agents. His authority is not derived from any act of Congress, and is not limited or changed by any conditions in an appropriation bill. This bill provides for a union of missions. By what authority does it prescribe to what countries diplomatic agents shall be sent, and that the minister accredited to Sweden and Norway shall be accredited also to Denmark? Suppose the President decides to send a minister to Sweden and Norway and not to Denmark, or to Denmark and not to Sweden and Norway, how is this bill to be construed? You may undoubtedly limit by law the amount to be paid as salary to such diplomatic agents or refuse to make any appropriation at all for such salaries, but Congress can not require the President to maintain ministers of a certain rank at particular courts or remove those who are there and reappoint in a different manner. This House should not fail to observe that the Constitution recognizes the Executive as the source of diplomatic authority.

Before this House commits itself to the innovation of uniting or abolishing missions I beg it to consider whether this is the time and these the missions which need that kind of reform.

The United States has swung into the current of submitting international troubles to arbitration. So far as the amount to be paid by one nation to another, whether for damages or on any other account, arbitration can not be too highly commended. At the same time the practice of presenting to an international court exaggerated and absurd claims which no nation would make if such claims had to be contended for in the final court of arbitration, can not be too severely condemned. A great nation should make no claim which it is not willing to maintain. We have heard on this floor eulogies of the arbitration of the Alabama claims under the treaty of Washington. Men worship the halo of glory which conceals hideous facts.

Arbitration is one form of negotiation; if the decision is acceptable to both parties it is adopted; if it is not acceptable it is repudiated. More than an attempt at negotiation by disinterested parties it ought not and can not be. The frequent instances in which the decisions of arbitrators have been promptly repudiated by the nations which have attempted that form of negotiation demonstrates that independent nations must always be the final judges of their own rights.

So far as arbitration encourages nations to violate international law and invade the rights of others by securing the aggressor against any greater harm than to be a party to a peaceful compromise, it is totally vicious in principle.

I shall enter upon no eulogy of the modern principle of surrendering national sovereignty and national rights in order to secure a peaceful settlement after such rights are invaded, but the adoption of that policy makes it absolutely essential that we should cultivate friendly relations and secure diplomatic influence at the European capitals where the judges are selected by whom our international rights are decided.

Our jurisdictional rights in the waters of the Bering Sea acquired from Russia and the right to protect the fur seals in that sea have, in accordance with the popular wish, been submitted to arbitration. The powers charged with the duty of preserving the seal fisheries from destruction are the United States and Russia. The whole world is interested in preserving the species.

The Canadians, tempted by the small profit to be derived from exterminating the only fur seals remaining on earth, in defiance of long-established precedent and of the United States, have fitted out fleets for that purpose. Every Canadian and every Englishman knew that the fleets fitted out in a Canadian port to destroy the fur seals were intended to injure and humiliate the United States. Had they also known that when the fleets returned, the ports from which they had sailed would be occupied by the troops of the United States, they would have delayed their departure until after the decision as to the lawful character of such an enterprise. No such question would have arisen but for the encouragement and protection afforded to enterprises of doubtful legality by modern international arbitration holding out the hope of benefits by compromise, and in any event shielding the trespassers from severe consequences.

This American question might have been settled by American methods on American soil. The popular wish is otherwise, and therefore this American question is transported to Paris and is to be decided by arbitrators, two to be named by the President of the United States, two by Her Britannic Majesty, one by the President of the French Republic, one by the King of Italy, and one by the King of Sweden and Norway. The arbitrators are to be jurists of distinguished reputation in their respective countries, and will doubtless be honorable and impartial, as far as human nature permits; but can there be any reason why the United States should seize upon this particular time for disturbing its diplomatic relations with the King of Sweden and Norway, who is to name one of the arbitrators? By this ungracious act, the union of Denmark with Sweden and Norway in one mission, it is assumed that a saving of a salary of one minister will be effected.

It is likely to prove a costly economy, which this Government can ill afford. We may be certain that the British Government will not imitate our example and, pending this arbitration, secure a small economy by means of a discourtesy to a foreign power.

If the edict has gone forth that every appropriation bill must be cut down in order to make a contrast between the wise expenditures of the last House and the wasteful parsimony of this one, let us at least discriminate in our retrenchments and make them where they will do the least harm. No petty and false economy should be allowed to endanger the rights of our country and humiliate the nation before the world. Our diplomatic service should contribute not merely to the wealth but to the honor, power, and glory of this Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will give me his attention, I desire to ask unanimous consent that general debate shall close to-morrow after the expiration of two hours.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The gentleman means two hours after the beginning of the debate. I hope the Chair will recognize me as taking the floor, and I will yield to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that on to-morrow, after two hours, all general debate on this bill shall close.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire as to how the time will be divided.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am very careless of the time. I am willing to do anything my friend wants done. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desires to speak.

Mr. HITT. Let it be divided in the usual way.

Mr. MCCREARY. I suggest that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. HITT. That will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH], a member of the committee, desires some time.

Mr. FITCH. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desires an hour, and that would take the entire hour on this side.

Mr. HITT. I will yield time to the gentleman.

Mr. FITCH. I would like to have half an hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will repeat the request, as we seem to have agreed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after two hours, all general debate on this bill shall be closed.

Mr. MCCREARY. One hour of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia, and the other hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desires to be heard.

Mr. HITT. I have no objection to the modification.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, Mr. OATES, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7624) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey, for Wednesday, April 27.

To Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania, for ten days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT.

Mr. GEARY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. GEARY. Mr. Speaker, the bill restricting the immigration of Chinese has come back from the Senate with some amendments, and as it is a matter which I desire to have disposed of, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6186) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. GEARY] asks unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not think that the bill ought to be disposed of in this way. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] if that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. HITT. If it is agreeable to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] it is to me.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I should be very glad for it to go to a conference, though I do not favor the bill.

There was no objection.

So the Senate amendments were nonconcurrent in, and the conference asked for was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as conferees on this bill the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARY], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, transmitting, in response to Senate resolutions of March 16 and 21, 1892, a report from the Acting Secretary of State, with accompanying statistics, showing the duties imposed by the Governments of Venezuela and Colombia upon products of the United States imported into those countries, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1445) for the relief of Adolph von Haake, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2653) granting to Sergt. Thomas O. Harter, Company I, First Indiana Cavalry, $10,000 and a gold medal for losses and services, which, in July and August, 1862, saved Pope's army and the nation's capital from capture by Lee's army, to report it adversely. In the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER], who has some interest, I think, in the bill, I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3008) for the relief of William Devine, teamster, authorizing the president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to receive him at one of the branches of said national home; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 3009) for the relief of David B. Moore, late a captain Company D, Sixteenth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers, and subsequently first sergeant Troop E, Seventh United States Cavalry and acting sergeant-major Seventh United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3012) to amend an act entitled "An act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 3013) providing that appointments in staff corps be made from the line of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3015) providing for the retirement of wagon masters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FELTON introduced a bill (S. 3016) for the relief of Charles Harkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 3017) to provide and equip a steam vessel for boarding purposes at Philadelphia, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3018) for the erection of a statue to the late Admiral David D. Porter, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 3019) to amend an act approved February 3, 1887, amending an act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men on the volunteer forces, approved June 3, 1884; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 3020) for the relief of Lieut. Col. George H. Elliot; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KENNA introduced a bill (S. 3023) to authorize the purchase of the manuscript of William Vans Murray; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. —) authorizing the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company to sell, transfer, and assign to the Leavenworth Terminal Railway and Bridge Company the rights and franchises as granted by acts of Congress approved February 25 and March 22, 1889, and by act of Congress approved July 25, 1890; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PERKINS. If there is no objection, I will ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. There are reasons why this matter is of considerable importance to those concerned. I think there can be no objection to it, and I should like to secure its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the joint resolution introduced by him may be now considered.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc. That permission be, and is hereby, granted to the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the State of Kansas, to sell, transfer, and assign to the Leavenworth Terminal Railway and Bridge Company, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the State of Kansas, its successors and assigns, all of the rights and franchises granted to the said Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company by an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, and Platte County, in the State of Missouri," approved April 25, 1889, and by an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, and Platte County, in the State of Missouri," approved March 2, 1889, and by an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company to substitute a pivot drawbridge over the Missouri River, in place of a pontoon bridge," approved July 25, 1890; and any such transfer and conveyance as has been heretofore made is hereby consented to and confirmed; all subject, however, to the conditions named in said act of Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. All that the joint resolution contemplates is that the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company may transfer to the Leavenworth Terminal Company the right to construct this bridge. They have sold the right and franchise to the latter company and that company now desire an approval of the location of the bridge. In consequence of this transfer, the Secretary of War doubts whether he can approve their application. They have made contracts with the railroad companies there to use the bridge when constructed, they have arranged for money for its construction, and they ask that this joint resolution may be passed by Congress giving to them the right to make this transfer. That is all there is of the measure, and it does not seem to me that there can be any objection to it.

Mr. KENNA. Is the joint resolution now introduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now introduced.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a matter of local importance to the people there, and can not be to the prejudice of anyone.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Kansas whether it does not propose to change the form of the bridge? It seems to me it gives the right to make a drawbridge instead of another kind.

Mr. PERKINS. There were two acts of Congress passed—one authorizing the construction of a pontoon bridge and the other authorizing the construction of a drawbridge. The joint resolution gives to this company the right to transfer both privileges, and the transfer is to be made with the conditions that were imposed upon the original company.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand this case, simply the rights, privileges, and authority granted in the two acts are transferred from one company to the other, subject to the same action of the Secretary of War.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, subject to all the original conditions. No change is contemplated in any particular, except—

Mr. COCKRELL. The joint resolution simply authorizes the Secretary of War to act upon the plans and specifications presented by this company instead of the original company?

Mr. PERKINS. That is all that is contemplated by the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Kansas that the parliamentary precedent in measures of this character is that they should be bills rather than joint resolutions. If there be no objection, the Chair will direct that the form of the measure be changed from that of a joint resolution to a bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I shall be very glad to accept the suggestion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made. Is there objection to present consideration?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to object to this measure, but I think it would be bad as a precedent. Here is a proposition introduced which it is proposed to pass into the form of a law without any reference. I would a great deal rather that it should be referred, informally even, to the Committee on Commerce and reported back. It is a very bad precedent to act in this way.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say in answer to the Senator that the joint resolution does not contemplate a change of the present law in any particular. It authorizes this transfer, but coupled with it all the conditions of the original act. The reason for early action is that these people have already arranged for the money with which to make the construction of the bridge, and they are only embarrassed in the War Department because of the transfer, the War Department thinking that it can not approve the application made in the name of this terminal company because the grant was to the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt, from the statements made by the Senator from Kansas, that the bill ought to pass, and the defect in the title ought to be cured, but it seems to me it would better to allow it to be referred to the Committee on Commerce and report it back to-day, because it is a pretty dangerous example to introduce and pass such measures without a reference.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The Committee on Commerce, I suppose, would have jurisdiction of this measure; and as we are in session every day, I think I can promise the Senator from Kansas that it will come back at least to-morrow.

Mr. PERKINS. With that understanding, I have no objection to a reference.

The bill (S. 3022) authorizing the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company to sell, transfer, and assign to the Leavenworth Terminal Railway and Bridge Company the rights and franchises as granted by acts of Congress approved February 25, and March 2, 1889, and by act of Congress approved July 25, 1890, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Chair to substitute the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] in my place on the committee of conference on the Chinese exclusion bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN in the chair). The request is made that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] be substituted as a member of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States in the place of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. There being no objection, that change will be made.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to state that I shall be necessarily absent from the Senate for the next three or four days, and therefore this change is necessary.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. QUAY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. POWER. I offer a resolution, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table, to be called up hereafter.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas at a meeting of representative citizens of Montana, known as the State irrigation convention, held in the city of Helena on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of January last, for the purpose of considering measures and policies beneficial to that Commonwealth and designed to aid in the settlement and development of the lands and resources within the same, the following resolutions were adopted, to wit:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to implore and, if possible, secure large appropriations for public surveys in Montana, this State having at present but one-fifth of its land surveyed, 70,000,000 acres being yet unsurveyed.

"Resolved, That we believe it will best subserve the interests of this State if no appropriation whatever be made to be expended under the direction of Maj. Powell, of the Government Geological Survey, for the State of Montana;" and

Whereas complaints have been made and heard through the press and through organized public bodies from all of the Western States, in which the largest portion of the remaining public domain is located, at the small areas of public lands that are now annually surveyed, thus hindering the progress of settlement and the security of titles; and

Whereas a growing opposition is manifested everywhere in the same region at the large annual appropriations that have been made and are still proposed for the carrying on of the United States topographical surveys which in the communities most seriously affected are regarded as part of an injurious plan to destroy the efficiency of the system of public land surveys; and which are also strenuously opposed as extravagant in expenditure, wasteful in management, and without suitable beneficial results to the people directly affected or the country at large: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That—be, —and are hereby, directed to make a full investigation into the relations of said Geological Survey Office and the topographical survey under it to the public lands, the necessity for the existence of two such systems in the same areas, their character, survey, and development, and as to the processes, personnel, and expenditures of the same, with power to send for persons and papers and to administer oath, reporting the results to the Senate at as early a day as possible, with such recommendations as may be deemed suitable.

MEMORIAL HALL AT WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Acting Attorney-General; which was read:

SIR: The attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York has informed me of the bequest of $250,000 to the United States Government by the will of Gen. George W. Cullum, deceased, and I have directed him to appear for the Government at the probate of the will. I have the honor to submit this information for such action as may be deemed proper, and inclose a copy of the items in the will relating to this bequest. I have also transmitted this information to the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES H. ALDRICH,
Acting Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HAWLEY. The accompanying extracts from the will are not long. I ask that they be read, so that they may be entered on the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read as suggested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Thirty-third. I give and bequeath to the Government of the United States the sum of $250,000 upon the following terms and conditions, viz: That during the life of Maj. Gen. James B. Fry and Peter S. Michie, hereinafter named, and at farthest within five years after my death, it will authorize to be built and will build and maintain upon the public grounds at West Point, N. Y., a fireproof stone memorial hall, under the direction of the superintendent of the Military Academy, three other members of the academic board thereof, and my military executor, Maj. Gen. James B. Fry, or, he not surviving at the time, another member of the academic board, all of whom I desire to be graduates of the Military Academy. This memorial hall I wish to be a receptacle of statues, busts, mural tablets, and portraits of distinguished deceased officers and graduates of the Military Academy, of paintings, of battle scenes, trophies of war, and such other objects as may tend to give elevation to the military profession; and to prevent the introduction of unworthy subjects into this hall, I desire that the selection of each shall be made by not less than two-thirds of the members of the entire academic board, the vote being taken by ayes and nays and to be so recorded. It is also my desire that this hall should be adapted for use on any ceremonial occasion taking place at West Point, N. Y., and for the assemblage and dinners of the association of graduates of the United States Military Academy, and, if practicable, I wish that lodging accommodations should be provided in some part of it for the members of that association while attending its annual reunions.

Thirty-fourth. In the event of the Government of the United States not complying with the conditions of the above gift and accepting it during the lives above named and at farthest within five years after my death, the $250,000 provided in article 33 of this will for the building of a memorial hall, I give and bequeath to Maj. Gen. James B. Fry, Peter S. Michie, and Edgar W. Bass the said sum in trust to erect the said memorial hall in the vicinity of West Point, N. Y., for the same purposes and under the same conditions as specified in the above article; and should it become necessary to purchase land for the site thereof, I give and bequeath for this purpose the additional sum of $20,000, or as much thereof as may become necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. From what State is the attorney-general who sends that communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It comes from the Acting Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought the signature was from another attorney-general.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is from the Acting Attorney-General.

Mr. HARRIS. Ah, the Acting Attorney-General.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, this very noble bequest deserves something more than a mere formal reference to a committee, and perhaps this is not the time to notice it as it should be acknowledged.

Gen. Cullum graduated from the Military Academy in 1833 and was retired in March, 1865, having become during the war a brigadier-general and brevet major-general, retiring as a lieutenant-colonel of engineers. He was an officer well known to the Army, of distinguished valor and patriotism, and an enthusiast in his profession.

This is a very, very noble bequest. There will be in that hall statues, portraits, tablets, and other memorials of the deeds of men who have deserved well of the Republic in war. It will be a perpetual instruction, a perpetual object lesson, teaching patriotic devotion.

I move that the communication and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the resolution of inquiry submitted by me some days since with reference to the purchase of silver bullion be taken from the table and passed. I do not know that any Senator desires to speak on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Resolution by Mr. STEWART relative to the aggregate cost of silver bullion and standard dollars coined therefrom, purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, now held in the Treasury, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. DOLPH. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the resolution has been heretofore presented to the Senate and that certain amendments have been agreed to. The resolution will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what is the aggregate cost of the silver bullion and standard dollars coined therefrom purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, and now held in the Treasury, and a detailed statement of the amount purchased each day, and the date thereof; and what amount of Treasury notes issued for such purpose is now outstanding, and whether any of such notes have been received by the Treasury in exchange for gold coin or redeemed in gold coin, and what amount of silver coin there is now in the Treasury applicable to the redemption of such notes, and also whether, when such notes are received into the Treasury for customs, taxes, and other public dues, they are reissued or retained in the Treasury; and if any of such notes have been retained in the Treasury what amount has been so retained. Are persons selling bullion to the United States under the act of July 14, 1890, required to make immediate delivery and take the bullion so sold out of the market, or are they given time to make such deliveries after having made a contract to supply the United States and deprive others of that opportunity? Does the public have notice of the times, places, and amounts of silver bullion which will be purchased by the United States, or are such purchases made of brokers and bankers without such public notice? Is the business of purchasing silver bullion under the act of July 14, 1890, conducted with a view of depressing the price of bullion and obtaining it as cheap as possible, or with a view of carrying out the "established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals (gold and silver) on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio?" And what amount of gold coin and gold bars is there in the Treasury, exclusive of outstanding gold certificates?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest an amendment. I move to insert at the close of the resolution:

And also to state the amount that the silver dollars and bullion on hand would have cost at the present prices of silver bullion.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese into the United States, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEARY, Mr. CHIPMAN, and Mr. HITT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2100) for the relief of Julius C. Zanone, only heir of John B. Zanone, late of Mound City, in Pulaski County, Ill., deceased:

A bill (S. 2401) for the relief of Lydia A. McGill, administratrix; and

A bill (H. R. 4833) to correct the military record of Joseph Wackerly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1415) for the relief of John Nickles; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6923, being the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6923) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole striking out the proviso beginning on page 17.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the discussion yesterday upon this proposition to strike out the proviso on page 17 of this bill took a very wide range, but not wider, perhaps, than is due to the condition of these two great trunk line railroads, the Union and the Central Pacific, and the obligations they are under to the United States Government to reimburse the Government for the liability which must fall upon it, in the end, as to the principal of the debt, and is falling upon it now continually as to the interest upon this debt, which may be summarized as amounting to, probably, $115,000,000, about the year 1897, which, I think, is about the average period of the maturity of this enormous amount of debt.

It is understood entirely by the country that by the legislation that took place in Congress, the United States, which had been the first mortgagee, having the prior lien upon the Union and the Central Pacific Railways, on all their properties and belongings, are postponed and made second mortgagee, and that the second-mortgage debt amounts to about as much as the first-mortgage debt. It is just the same in principal, but the interest on what is now the prior incumbrance has been extinguished by the companies along from time to time, so that the companies have not been in default for interest, as I understand, to those bondholders of either corporation. They have gone on and paid up the interest, and to that extent have extinguished the obligation, and it will not be in the year 1897 as great as the obligation of these companies to the United States Government by some millions of dollars; in fact, if the operations of the road go on uninterruptedly, as they have heretofore, there will be just the same amount of money owing by these two railroad companies that comprise the principal of the debt that the United States Government has become responsible for and guaranteed.

In that situation, Mr. President, the House of Representatives has evidently been reaching out for the purpose of grasping every item of money that might present itself in any form to be added in some way or other to the sinking fund, or if not to the sinking fund in fact, to the same end or purpose that the sinking fund is designed to accomplish under the provisions of the Thurman act; that is to say, the Government of the United States is endeavoring to save as against these two companies one-half of all the cost of the transportation of the mails and of the Government material, men, horses, etc., transported for the Army.

Then the question arises whether this provision in this bill, seeking as I understand the purpose of it is, though it is not very distinctly stated in the proviso—to save one-half of all the money that we may expend upon any of these branch lines at the ordinary rates of computing the transportation—can be accomplished by deducting from the pay that will be due to the branch lines 50 per cent.

A question arises as to the identity of the branch lines and the original great trunk companies. Treating that as a legal question and testing it by the operation of the laws under which these different branch lines were chartered, especially as to the Union Pacific Company, they are not legally identical. Whether the contract which is expressed in the charter of these two great trunk companies in 1862 and 1864, by which they agreed that one-half of the transportation charges due from the United States for any service that might be rendered by these railroads should be retained or paid into the Treasury in the extinguishment of the interest pro tanto upon these bonds can be made applicable to these branch lines, of course depends upon the fact whether or not they are legally the same.

Now, as to the Union Pacific Company, I am satisfied that no man can establish the proposition in law that they are identical, for these different corporations have received their charters from different States and Territories upon different conditions, and each of the charters relates to a separate line of road, which, it is true, is a branch line of the Union Pacific or the Central Pacific in the sense of being a shorter line and communicating with it and looking to these two lines for the transit of commerce back and forth to the Atlantic or the Pacific Ocean, as the case may be, or intermediate points, and also in the sense that the majority of the stock and of the bonds of all these branch lines is owned by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

If these branch lines are not identical with the trunk lines, then it follows that we have not any constitutional right to take the income which these branch lines shall earn and give the credit for that sum of money on a debt due us from a trunk line, for they are different and entirely distinct in law. Such legislation as that would imply the power of taking one man's money and paying another man's debt with it, which, of course, we can not do. That is ultra vires, so far as the Congress of the United States is concerned. The Constitution restrains us, so that we can not do it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will it interfere with the Senator from Alabama—because I want to hear him upon this particular point—if I should make a suggestion to him?

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Perhaps it is a matter not known to the Senator from Alabama or to many members of the Senate, but it has been revealed during the past summer that there is a floating debt of something like eighteen or twenty million dollars of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which, under the decisions of the courts, always will have priority of right as against all of the mortgage debt of the road, particularly if that money is a legitimate deficiency and is a floating debt of the road by reason of equipment, of betterments, or any expenses, or anything of that kind. The reports of this company nowhere reveal the fact that any such deficiency has arisen for any of these purposes, and as the Thurman law, as I think impliedly, if not expressly, prohibits the alienation of any of this money for any other purpose except for the natural and proper expenses of running the road, I want to ask where has arisen, from what sources, this deficiency of $20,000,000, to secure which all of the stock and bonds and securities of these branch lines, as I am informed by the Commissioner of Railroads, amounting to nearly $100,000,000, par value, have been turned over to a syndicate in the city of New York to secure the payment of this floating debt?

Mr. MORGAN. Turned over by whom?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Turned over by the Union Pacific Railroad Company to a syndicate of New York bankers to secure some eighteen or twenty million dollars of floating debt, and they hold all these securities, which have been variously estimated by the committee to be worth, I think, some forty or fifty million dollars, and by others to be worth as high as $100,000,000.

We will suppose, for instance, that these parties in New York, in order to recoup themselves for the advances made to protect the floating debt of the road, holding all these securities, should undertake to sell them all out, then, I wish to know, if the Senator will be so kind as to give his opinion both as a Senator and as a lawyer, under that section of the Thurman act which I read yesterday, whether it is competent in law or morals for the officers and managers of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to so use the credit and money of that road in the building or the purchasing or the leasing of branch lines of road as to enable them to pile up a debt of $20,000,000 under which they may be able to sell out the road and branches and deprive the Government of everything?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I rise only to express the hope that the Senator from Alabama will proceed with his remarks as to the subject of the ultra vires of the proposed legislation, the line of remarks which he was pursuing before the Senator from New Jersey took the floor; and to facilitate the statement he was about to make, I say to him that the stocks of many of these railroads operated by the Union Pacific have, to a great extent, an entirely independent ownership from the Union Pacific and other companies who operate them; that their bonds are held in general market, and that they are under no obligation, express or implied, whereby their earnings shall be wrested from them and applied to the payment of the debt due from these subsidized roads to the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that the principle of the Thurman act is just this, that a contract exists between these corporations and the Government by which 50 per cent of the earnings of the roads in the service of the Government shall be retained and carried either into the sinking fund or into the payment of interest, and that the Supreme Court held that that contract applied only to the subsidized portions of the road and did not apply to the unsubsidized portions, that is, the unbonded portions, so to speak, of these railroads, and that it was not competent for Congress to charge upon the nonsubsidized portions of this railroad the 50 per cent of the earnings upon the subsidized portions; they charge that to the company under that contract, and hold that it would be a violation of the contract to expand it over a field which it was not intended to cover at the time it was made, and that is the real principle of the Thurman act so far as that feature of it is concerned.

However, the Supreme Court went on and in a very pronounced manner in that case and in many others to establish the proposition that the right to alter, amend, and repeal these charters carried with it a very large legislative control over the management of the income and general direction of the road, which places it within the competency of Congress to realize from the assets of these companies a fund to be lodged in the Treasury of the United States for the ultimate redemption of the bonds and interest; and in doing that, as the Senator from New Jersey has observed, the Congress of the United States has required, as I understand the Thurman act, that all of the assets and property of these respective companies of every kind and character shall be considered as virtually under mortgage for the purpose of raising such a sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds and the accruing interest, and that dividends are postponed entirely until this sinking fund is filled up, according to the provisions of that statute, so that the stockholders of these trunk-line companies can not get any dividends until those requirements have been fully complied with. That is what I understand to be the general effect and purpose of the Thurman act.

The proposed proviso here, which our Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have proposed to strike out in the bill as reported, goes upon the idea that Congress has an independent right, independent of any contract, to retain in the hands of the Government a sum of money to meet an indebtedness of the party to whom that money is payable under any and all circumstances; and very often we have exercised that right. Where money was coming to States that were indebted to the Federal Government on any account it has been withheld from payment by the Treasury of the United States until a recent period in conformity with law. The general proposition that the Government of the United States has the right to retain money that may come into its Treasury against a creditor whose debt is acknowledged, and to make a set-off of one sum against the other, I think nobody is prepared to deny.

That proposition, Mr. President, can not apply to these branch lines of road unless the branch lines and the trunk lines are the same, for when we make a contract, for instance, with a branch line for $10,000 for the conveyance of munitions of war, and that service is performed, when the $10,000 comes to be paid to the branch lines if we assert by an act of Congress that that branch line is not another company, and we assert it incorrectly and untruly, we violate, I think, the Constitution of the United States, because then you take the property of one person to pay the debt of another. This proposition, therefore, in the bill can not be sustained upon that ground. Unless there is a legal identity between these various corporations it can not be sustained.

So far as the contract of the Union Pacific Railroad Company is concerned, that can not be extended so as to include the branch lines unless actual legal identity exists between the branch lines and the Union Pacific. I have an opinion that in the progress of building the branch lines of the Central Pacific Railroad the project of consolidation has been carried so far that it may have resulted, as to that line, in creating a legal identity between the branch lines and the Central Pacific Company. But that is not so as to the Union Pacific. There has been no consolidation of the branch lines with the Union Pacific.

There is no doubt that the Union Pacific was at a late date—what it may be to-day I do not know—the holder of a majority of the bonds of these various branch lines, taken aggregately or singly, and there is no doubt that the Union Pacific Company also owns a majority of the stock of the branch lines.

Mr. STEWART. This proviso does not withhold payment from the Central Pacific. It withholds from the Southern Pacific.

Mr. MORGAN. I know. It does that because the Southern Pacific absorbed the Central Pacific.

Mr. STEWART. The Southern Pacific simply leased it.

Mr. MORGAN. Absorbed it for ninety-nine years, and that is equivalent to a purchase.

The Union Pacific does hold a majority of the stock in each of these branch lines, and it does hold, or did hold, a majority of the bonds of each of these branch lines. What it has done with its bonds since the select committee of the Senate of which I am a member made the investigation and report here of course I do not know, but I infer from what the Senator from New Jersey says that certain gentlemen connected more or less remotely with these railways have assumed or paid a large amount of the floating indebtedness of these several branch lines; that the Union Pacific Company has consented that these branch corporations shall turn over these bonds into their hands to indemnify them against the money which they have in this way advanced to these branch lines. I do not know anything about that, although I can see that there is plenty of opportunity for any arrangement of that kind in the existing state of legislation upon this subject.

Before passing on to a further explanation of the real relation between the branch lines and the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language of this proviso to see if I understand it correctly, for I must confess that I read it with a good deal of uncertainty as to what it means. After enumerating the various descriptions of army transportation for which an appropriation is to be made, and then summing up the whole appropriation at $2,850,000, for all the descriptions of service which is precedently described in that part of the bill, it goes on to provide further:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by the Union Pacific Railway Company, including the lines of the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway Company, or by the Southern Pacific Company over lines embraced in its Pacific system.

Now, suppose that the Secretary of War finds himself unable to use any of this $2,850,000 for the purpose of paying the transportation upon these lines, the next question arises how are you going to get the transportation? Suppose these branch lines refuse to take it because there is no appropriation for payment to them, who can compel them to do it? What legal power has the Congress of the United States over these local corporations, chartered under the laws of States and Territories, to compel them to take the army transportation and carry it over their lines when we expressly say that no money that is paid under this bill for the purpose of army transportation shall be applied to them at all? It seems to me, if I understand the bill correctly, that that proviso would defeat the operation of the bill as to providing any service to the Government of the United States of the sort indicated under this head of army transportation, for, if we can not pay for it out of that fund, we have no other fund out of which to pay for it that I know of, and there is no general provision for paying for army transportation over any railroad in the United States.

The general provision is that you shall pay for army transportation so many millions of dollars. Of course, the Government selects the roads over which this transportation is to be carried and makes its contracts. When you come to the land subsidized roads and the bonded roads, as they are called, then you must make certain allowances in favor of the Government out of the contract for the transportation according to the particular situation of the particular line of road. If it is a bonded road, if it is the Union or Central Pacific Railway, you take out 50 per cent, and you apply that 50 per cent, not by paying it into the Treasury of the United States, but you apply it to the interest on this bonded debt. It is a trust fund as soon as it is paid in for the purpose of extinguishing the bonded debt or the interest upon it, which we have guaranteed for these two particular railroads.

Here comes one of the nonbonded branches of the Union Pacific or the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and you ask it to carry your military transportation upon its line. Its managers say: "Here is an act of Congress by which you are expressly prohibited from paying any of this $2,850,000 to us; you can not make a valid contract to pay any of that money to us; there is no other money to pay it, and we are simply excluded, and so you can not get the transportation." That is the way it strikes me, that according to the form of this bill and the proviso, it simply prohibits the United States from employing one of these nonbonded roads in the transportation of army material.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless they perform the service without compensation.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course that amounts to a prohibition, and in that view of the case, if there was nothing else presented, I should be compelled to vote with the committee for striking out that proviso.

But there is another reason which operates strongly upon my mind about this matter. If I have misconstrued the real meaning of this proviso, and if it is intended simply to bring the nonbonded branch lines within the purview and meaning and operation of the contract of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, so as to make the contract operative against them upon the ground that they really belong in equity and in fact to the Union and the Central Pacific Railroads, yet I could find, I think, some very important public reasons why that would be dangerous legislation.

Mr. STEWART. The Supreme Court says it would be unconstitutional.

Mr. MORGAN. It might in one sense, but I am not treating of that now; I am speaking of the policy of it. Every dollar of money that we impose upon any of these branch lines is going to be earned and paid by the lines, but it will be earned out of the people who live there, and be paid by them. The trouble about it is, that that money, when collected under this bill, goes into the general fund in the Treasury, instead of into the sinking fund of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies. The object of the Thurman act was to carry all these earnings into that sinking fund or to pay them on the interest debt. They can not be carried there under the provisions of this bill, they can not be collected in the name of or on behalf of the Union and Central Pacific Railways. They are collected upon the idea that these branch railroads have come under an obligation to turn over to the United States one-half of the amount of all earnings for Government transportation.

Mr. STEWART. The whole.

Mr. MORGAN. One-half, I will say for the present purpose, of all the transportation over their lines, because they are identical with the Union and the Central Pacific Railroads.

So I should say, Mr. President, that aside from all difficulties of a legal or constitutional character connected with this proviso, it would be unwise legislation, and it really does not meet the purpose which I suppose actuated the House of Representatives in putting that feature in this bill. It does not transfer into the sinking fund of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, held in the Treasury, the amount of money which would be due to the United States under that contract, if the contract is obligatory upon them.

It is not an execution of the contract. The bill does not execute it. The Thurman act takes 50 per cent of the earnings of these railroads for transportation made on account of the United States and carries it into the sinking fund. This bill does not do that; it does not profess to do it; it makes no provision of that sort; it merely leaves the money in the Treasury by prohibiting the payment, we will say, of one-half; the Senator from Nevada says all.

Mr. STEWART. The original act of 1862 required that the entire earnings should be applied on the interest. The act of 1864 provided that one-half should be applied. Then the Thurman act provided that the half which was released should be retained and put in the sinking fund and 5 per cent of the net earnings also should be paid in under the original act. Congress said that that should go into the sinking fund and enough more to make 25 per cent of the net earnings. All this was to go into the sinking fund.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that; but the point I was making is this, that the Thurman act looks to the proposition that we will take whatever amount of money might be due from the United States to these railroads for transportation of any kind and carry one-half of it into a sinking fund.

Mr. STEWART. And the other half went on the interest under the original contract.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good; but this bill makes no provision of that kind. This bill merely prohibits paying any of such earnings to these companies. So it does not execute that contract, if you call it a contract, contained in the charters, but it comes down to the naked proposition whether we have the right to compel these branch lines to carry our transportation, withholding from them all pay for that service. Well, now, to just state that as a naked proposition, of course it appears a very unjust one, and I think it violates the Constitution of the United States, or at all events there is so much question about it that it is hardly a proper provision to go into an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I regret very much that the House of Representatives have not put this matter into such shape as that we can pass this part of the bill with due respect to our own convictions about its constitutionality and the right of Congress to do such a thing as this, for I am anxious that legislation should be had to take hold of this subject, and in the direction which the House seems to be going upon this bill, and I believe that, unless we do legislate upon this case in regard to these railroads from the shoulder, we are ultimately going to be swamped in an enormous amount of debt, and this property will be frittered away by one contrivance and another, so that we shall never be able to get hold of it.

The Senate will remember that the Judiciary Committee of this body had the subject of the adjustment of the debt of the transcontinental Pacific Roads for several years under consideration, and reported two or three different bills, against which more or less objection was found; but in the objections which were found to these different propositions of legislation there was developed more and more clearly a knowledge of the actual rights of the United States against these railroads. Then, when the Judiciary Committee got into such a condition upon this measure as that they could not agree about any of these great leading features, they came into the Senate and asked to be relieved from the further consideration of the subject—rather a remarkable proceeding, but at the same time one which was entirely justified by a state of facts which nobody seemed to know how to remedy.

Thereupon it was proposed that a select committee of Senators should be appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the condition of those two great trunk lines and all of their branches, and all their rights and property of every description, and their belongings, and the whole situation. That committee took into consideration a report made by commissioners whom Congress had sent over the lines of these railroads, and who made a most patient and exhaustive investigation into every fact connected with their condition. I do not suppose the history of any enterprise in the United States has been more thoroughly explored or more exactly stated as the history of the Union and Central Pacific Railways, with all of their branches, in reports made to the Congress of the United States by that commission, and in two subsequent reports made by the select committee of the Senate, and also in reports made by the committees of the House.

Every fact, I think, that any person could desire to know in respect to the exact situation of these railways has been ascertained, down to the date of the last report by the Senate committee; but the Senator from New Jersey informs me that since that time some other transactions of a very peculiar and extraordinary nature have taken place, which, according to the way he states them, are contrary to the Thurman act, violative of the acts of Congress, and ought to be abrogated, and those men ought to be dealt with who have thus undertaken to interfere with the assets of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Now, how to get at them is not agreed upon exactly. I call to mind, however, in that connection, the effort which was made by the Attorney-General of the United States, under instructions from Congress, to recover damages from those men who had speculated in an unworthy way, perhaps—I have not any doubt of it—through the Crédit Mobilier and other contrivances upon the assets and property of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, especially upon its stocks and bonds.

That suit was brought. Congress instructed that the United States should sue. Congress did not suppose or know that it had no right to control the corporation and compel it to bring a suit, and I suppose it did not, so the suit was brought in the name of the United States, and lingered along for some time in the courts.

Finally it was decided that the United States had not any standing in court to punish those men who had defrauded these corporations of their assets or had dealt falsely with the securities which we had indorsed and sent out, or made improper disposition of the telegraph line privileges, or the public lands, or anything else connected with their endowment by Congress.

That suit went on until the statute of limitations barred all remedy in the name of the corporation itself against these men for wrongs and outrages of so flagrant a character as to have attracted the attention of Congress and of the people at large, and about which, I think, there was a general belief that the men charged were guilty as charged.

Then the Congress of the United States found that it could not rectify that evil through the judicial tribunals of the United States, that it could not compel the company to bring such suits, that the companies held an independent attitude towards Congress so far as that matter was concerned, and had a right to collect a debt or not as it saw proper to do.

We then fell back upon the next remedy, and that was to appoint a commission to examine and report and recommend measures. They did so. Mr. Cleveland, who was then President of the United States, sent in that report with a somewhat eulogistic statement of its merits and a recommendation to the Congress of the United States that legislation should be had here of a character to avoid the taking into the control of the United States Government these railroads, and at the same time, by indulgence to the corporations themselves, to enable them to work out the debt, as is very often the case when there is a failing or bankrupt debtor, a man sometimes has to lend him money to enable him to carry on his business or collect his assets in order to pay at the end of a certain time. That was our situation.

Then came this committee of the Senate, and after they had reported a bill for a settlement with the Union Pacific Railroad Company the matter came up in the Senate, and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as to which no report was made at that time, in 1888, objected on this floor to the consideration of any bill for the Union Pacific Railroad Company which did not also include the Central Pacific Railroad Company. They had reasons for desiring that there should be a conjoint action under a bill for the relief of both of those roads, and the reasons seemed to be very strong; at all events they were quite sufficient to absolutely defer any final action at that session of Congress upon the question.

A rather remarkable thing occurred in relation to that report. The House was Democratic and the Senate was Republican, and the House committee and the Senate committee were absolutely unanimous in their agreement upon that measure. There was not a dissenting voice in either committee in either House in opposition to the Union Pacific bill. That was a bill which provided for a settlement of this whole matter of the debt of the Union Pacific Company at the expiration of fifty years, the debt to carry 3 per cent interest, distributed, however, in unequal proportions along to meet certain contingencies which we feared might arise in the course of the administration of the railroad under such provisions.

The Senate then instructed the select committee to make a visit over these roads and examine them, and we did so, substituting two Senators for the committeemen who could not go. The examination was made thoroughly and completely so far as the Senate committee could possibly do it, with the assistance of experts in railroad matters, and with the examination of every man whom the committee could find who really knew anything about the roads in any particular. Every branch was examined, its relations to the trunk lines was examined, the amount of its stock, the cost of its construction, the cost of its equipment, the cost of its maintenance, its income, and every fact connected with every branch of each of these great trunk lines was examined into and reported here by this committee.

The report lies before me now. I do not propose to go into that report to-day. It is not necessary that I should do so, except very briefly, but from that report I extract facts which I have stated here. At the time that report was made the Union Pacific Railroad Company owned a majority of the stock in every one of these branch lines, and owned a majority of the bonds, not a very large majority of the bonds, but a much larger majority of the stock. The stocks had found their way out into private ownership disconnected from the great railway to some extent, but not to a very great extent. Practically the Union Pacific Railroad Company owned and managed every branch that ran to it, including the Oregon Short Line and all the rest, and that railroad company made a great deal of income out of these branch lines. They were a most admirable facility towards improving the property and resources of the Union Pacific Railroad so that it could ultimately pay its debts.

There is no complaint to be made against the Union Pacific that it branched out and covered a large area of territory with branch lines, which have been contributing in money quite a large sum, increasing the prosperity of the railroad company and increasing the value of its property and of its funds and its ultimate ability to pay the United States Government. That scheme has also had a very marked effect upon the population and development of the great Western country through which these trunk lines pass, north and south of it. Perhaps there has been no parallel, in a country that is not more inviting than that, in the history of any country, to the increase of population and wealth of every sort out in that vast Western region, over which these branch lines were spread out from the trunk lines. To some extent that may be said, and to quite a large extent, in regard to the Central Pacific, but not quite so obvious or important as it is in regard to the Union Pacific.

I ask the Reporter to copy and insert here, from the report of the committee, on page 21, which I hold in my hand, a table which I will not detain the Senate by trying to read, which includes, however, every one of the branches of the Union Pacific and shows the actual mileage of each, how much of the funded debt was held by the Union Pacific Railway, and how much was held by the public at the time of the making of this report.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state the figures here. At the time of the making of this report the funded debt of the branch lines of the Union Pacific Company, as they are called, amounted to $26,717,700, held by the Union Pacific, and $23,215,000 were held by other parties—"held by the public" is what the report says—whether held by private owners of the Union Pacific stock or not we could not ascertain—held by the public at large.

Of the capital stock of these branch roads on page 23 there is a table, as follows:

Of course, the control through the stock was absolute in behalf of the road, and as far as these statistics go they show that the Union Pacific was the real equitable owner of every one of these branch lines, and our opinion, as expressed in this report, was that it was owning a very good property, it had made a wise provision for the securing of the branch lines, without which there would have been very little profit out of the Union Pacific Railroad, because the people of the United States have found out that a trunk line carrying only freight from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean is not a paying property. It requires the feed to be derived from the branch lines that come in, and from shorter hauls, to make any money with these great trunk lines.

Mr. CULLOM. Still, was it not true that many of these branch lines were entirely devoid of any profit, many of them hardly paying expenses, others going into the hands of creditors, and some of them not paying fixed charges? Is that not true?

Mr. MORGAN. There were only perhaps two cases where there were short lines driven out to meet expected developments in mining regions which failed because the mining prospects failed, but those lines were not very expensive.

Mr. ALLISON. They were all profitable to the main line.

Mr. MORGAN. They brought in their money.

Mr. CULLOM. I agree with the Senator that they helped to build up the trunk lines, but I thought they themselves were nonpaying.

Mr. MORGAN. As I remember now, there were only two instances of that kind, and they were short lines, not of very considerable moment, which had to be abandoned or virtually abandoned—I do not know that either one was actually abandoned—but virtually abandoned because the service upon those lines was infrequent and not remunerative. That is enough for me to say now about the situation of the Union Pacific as to branch lines.

The Central Pacific Railroad, as it now exists—

I read from the report of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who made the report of the committee upon that line. The chairman of the committee [Mr. FRYE] made the report upon the Union Pacific line—

The Central Pacific Railroad, as it now exists, embraces by consolidation a number of extensions and branches which are not, of course, included in the subsidized portion of the road.

The Senate will notice the language "embraced by consolidation."

Mr. STEWART. There are some roads about San Francisco consolidated, but then those roads were not consolidated. I have a list of them in the decision of the Court of Claims, about 1,700 miles.

Mr. MORGAN. The report continues:

These consolidations were made in 1870 and added to the system several railroads. The following statement of this consolidation and of the roads thus acquired is made in the report of the Pacific Railway Commission. (Page 66.)

There were at this time already in existence two railroads, known as the San Francisco and Alameda and the San Francisco and Oakland, which controlled valuable ferry privileges connecting Oakland and Alameda with the city of San Francisco. (See evidence of Cohen, volume 5, pages 2391, 2392.) Another line, known as the San Francisco Bay Company, was constructed for the purpose of effecting communication between Niles and Oakland. (See evidence of Cohen, volume 5, page 2395.)

At about this same period a project was formed for establishing communication between the Central Pacific and the State of Oregon. With this object in view, a company known as the California and Oregon Railroad Company was formed and commenced the construction of its railroad from Roseville to Coles, which is on the State boundary.

Another railroad was constructed for the purpose of effecting a connection between the Western Pacific and Goshen. This road begins at Lathrop, a point on the Western Pacific Railroad, and extends southerly to Goshen, a distance of 146 miles.

By a series of consolidations, all of the above-mentioned companies became integral parts of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

The first consolidation took place between the San Francisco Bay Railroad Company and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, on the 28th day of October, 1869. (See volume 5, page 2407.)

The next consolidation was effected between the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, including the San Francisco Bay Railroad Company, through the prior consolidation. This consolidation was effected on the 23d of June, 1870. (Volume 5, page 2407.)

The San Francisco and Oakland Railroad Company consolidated with the San Francisco and Alameda Railroad Company on the 28th of June, 1870, the name of the new company being the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad Company. (See volume 5, page 2408.)

The final consolidation was effected between the Central Pacific Railroad Company, the California and Oregon Company, the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad Company, and the San Joaquin Valley Railroad Company. This consolidation bears date the 20th day of August, 1870, and the corporation organized thereunder is the present Central Pacific Railroad Company. (See volume 5, page 2408.)

The portion of this railroad, in consideration of which the bonds of the United States were issued, is that which extends from Ogden to Sacramento, and thence to Niles and San José. No bonds were issued for the connecting railroads between Niles and Oakland, or on the California and Oregon Railroad, or on the San Joaquin Branch.

Then the quotation from the Pacific Railway Commission report goes on to give some particulars which will be found in the text that I wish inserted in my remarks:

Another statement of this consolidation is to be found on page 22 of the report of the Pacific Railway Commission, and is as follows:

"The Central Pacific Railroad, as it now exists, embraces by consolidation a number of extensions and branches which are not included in the subsidized portion of the road. These consolidations took place in 1870, and their effect was to add to the system the following railroads, which are not included in the line above described, from Ogden to San José:

"First. The railroad called the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad, extending from Niles to Oakland, on the Bay of San Francisco, and opposite the city of San Francisco, a distance of 24.31 miles, with some additional extensions for the purpose of connecting with the ferries.

"Second. The California and Oregon Railroad, now extending from Roseville, Cal., to the boundary of the State of Oregon, a distance of 296.47 miles.

"Third. The San Joaquin Valley Railroad, extending from Lathrop southerly to Goshen, a distance of 146.06 miles (see volume 5, pages 2407 and 2408).

"The corporation formed by these consolidations is the present Central Pacific Railroad Company, comprising a total mileage of 1,357.29 miles, of which 860.77 miles are subsidized and 496.52 miles are unsubsidized. The subsidized portion of the road, it will be noticed, had no direct communication with San Francisco.

A further statement appears (pages 76, 77, Report Pacific Railway Commission) as follows, as to the consolidation between the San Francisco Bay Railroad and the Western Pacific Railroad, and their consolidation with the Central Pacific, and as to the consolidation of the San Francisco and Oakland Railroad Company (they being the product of a prior consolidation of the San Francisco and Oakland and the San Francisco and Alameda Railroad Company) with the Central Pacific:

"The San Francisco Bay Company was organized on the 25th of September, 1868, the principal stockholders being Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, C. Crocker, and E. B. Crocker. Its object was the construction of a railroad, commencing at Goat Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, and connecting with the Western Pacific Railroad. Stanford was the president, E. B. Crocker the vice-president, Mark Hopkins the treasurer, E. H. Miller the secretary. These four gentlemen, together with Mr. Charles Crocker, constituted the board of directors. On the 21st of October, 1869, the board adopted a resolution that the said company pay to the Contract and Finance Company, for the work done and materials furnished in building its railroad, the sum of $3,255,000, of which amount $2,995,000 was to be paid in the capital stock of the company.

"The resolution further provided for a consolidation between the San Francisco Bay Railroad Company and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, on the basis of a total authorized capital stock of $10,400,000; each stockholder in the constituent companies to receive such number of shares in the new company as should equal the number of shares held by them, respectively, in the constituent companies. The San Francisco Bay Railroad was about 260 miles in length. The Western Pacific Railroad Company, thus consolidated, represented 123 miles of railroad, from Sacramento to San José, and 240 miles of railroad of the San Francisco Bay Railroad Company—in all 149 miles of road. It was received into the Central Pacific Railroad subject to a bonded indebtedness of $1,874,000, and with a capital stock of $7,500,000, which was exchanged, dollar for dollar, for stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

"The San Francisco and Oakland Railroad Company and the San Francisco and Alameda Railroad Company were short roads, built to connect with the ferries crossing the bay. There were consolidated on the 28th of June, 1870, the consolidated company being known as the San Francisco, Oakland, and Alameda Railroad Company. The stock of the new company was fixed at $2,000,000. The ferry franchises owned by this corporation were exceedingly valuable, and, in the judgment of the Commission, its consolidation with the Central Pacific Railroad Company, which occurred on the 20th of August, 1870, on the basis of $2,000,000 capital stock, which was exchanged for stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, was an advantage to the consolidated company."

That is enough to say about the situation of the Central Pacific. But after this union between the Central Pacific and the branches took place, it is a matter of no very considerable importance as to whether the Central Pacific owned a majority of the stock of these different companies or not. It has, I understand, a consolidation, which means an incorporation of the roads together.

The Central Pacific Railroad then went into the possession of a Kentucky company, called the Southern Pacific Railway Company, a company organized under the laws of Kentucky, which made a lease of the Central Pacific Railroad for ninety-nine years upon certain conditions, which are expressed in the lease, which is in this report, and Senators can find it by looking it over if they have any curiosity to see what the precise terms of the lease were. This company took all of the income of the Central Pacific Railway Company and all of its branches for ninety-nine years, paying to that company a stipend, an annual rental proportioned to the amount of income to a certain degree, not to fall below a certain sum and not to rise above a certain sum, but within those two limits, to be graded according to the income of the system. That Central Pacific Railroad Company went on and added to its property some other extensions to the east, and, I believe, it finally terminates at Newport News, in Virginia, but the Congress of the United States have not any connection with that subject.

Whether Congress has a right to treat the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company as being identical is a question which I admit is open to debate, but it is not a question upon which I think any man could express a very conclusive opinion, perhaps not an opinion sufficiently conclusive to enable him to legislate with a sense of absolute justice, in the regard proposed in this bill.

That, now, is the general situation as far as I choose to trace it in the remarks which I am making here to-day, and upon that general situation I do not find that the Congress of the United States would be justified in passing the proviso which is found in this bill either as to the Central or the Union Pacific, though I grant that there are stronger reasons for passing the bill in respect of the Central than of the Union Pacific, because there is a consolidation, to some extent at least, and through that consolidation there is a sort of legal union between the two which might justify us in saying that the branch lines thus consolidated of the Central Pacific became responsible for all the obligations and contracts of the Central Pacific Railroad.

While we have all the particular terms of the consolidation before us, which we did not have before the committee, I think we were entirely justified in assuming that, in consequence of that consolidation, the branch roads so consolidated became responsible for the contract of the trunk lines, of which they were made a part by consolidation, to the Government of the United States.

In 1890 the report from which I have been reading was made after this examination by the committee in person of every line and everything connected with it. The bill, which was then reported by the committee, included both railroads, and we virtually accepted the propositions of both companies, except that we modified the proposition of the Union Pacific Railroad considerably in view of the experience that the committee had in the matter upon further observation; but the report, in respect of these two bills, went upon this particular plan, this particular hypothesis, that what is termed the present value of these railroads respectively could be ascertained by actuaries on a basis of calculations that would cause a certain rate of interest and a certain distribution of payments to extinguish the debt by payments into the Treasury of the United States in the one case in seventy years, I believe was the last proposition, and in the other case, of the Central Pacific Railway, one hundred years; and the committee thought that it made no difference to the Government of the United States, as it was not now borrowing money, when it got its money back into the Treasury, if, when the final account came to be cast up, it could not be said that the Government of the United States had lost a penny.

That was the idea of the committee, and I think it was a correct one. So far as I am personally concerned, I had rather have this money brought back into the Treasury of the United States gradually in small installments, than to have it dumped in in one installment if these companies were able to pay it. I think it would be a very great temptation and really a very great danger to this country to have one hundred and thirteen or one hundred and twenty millions of money dumped into the Treasury of the United States at one time, now or any other day you may choose to name, for it would be a carcass around which the eagles would gather, and we should have more trouble, more demoralization, more derangement of our finances in the distribution of that money out through different schemes and jobs which would be claiming it, than we should have if we should lose the whole of it. It would be better to lose the whole probably than to have it brought in in that form.

So I concurred and joined very heartily with the committee in making the report for such indulgence of time as would save the railroad companies in the hands of their stockholders, without bringing them into absolute bankruptcy, and that we would extend the interest for such a period of time and at so low a rate as would remove from them the temptation of prowl upon the people, for, after all, in respect of every railroad in the United States, more definitely in respect to them perhaps than of any other class of corporations, not excepting the national banks, the people of the United States of every class, kind, and condition must make their personal contribution to the support and earnings of dividends by these railroads. Everybody has to pay something to a railroad as everybody has to pay something to the post-office; and whatever course of policy will induce or compel the laying of a light hand upon the people, in respect to these demands upon their contributions, is a wise, a good, and a just course of policy.

I had in mind a plan by which I think it could be accomplished absolutely and with perfect certainty in its operation, but I was willing to accept this plan of the committee—and so was every member of the House committee and every member of the Senate committee in respect to the Union Pacific Railroad, and every member of the Senate committee in respect to the last bill, which brought the two railroads together in one bill, and there was only a slight opposition, I think, in the committee of the House to this bill reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]—for dealing with the two roads in one act of legislation.

But after that report was made and it was obvious that the force bill and the McKinley bill, and the like, were going to drive them off and we should get no legislation at all, persons in New York and thereabouts commenced speculating upon the Union Pacific road, and some men of notorious connection with this road heretofore in the times of the Credit Mobilier and a little later, against whom the people of the United States demanded action should be brought to see what they owed and what they defrauded the railroad out of, became again connected, by purchases in the stock market of New York, with this railroad corporation and commenced to control it.

What has taken place since that time this committee has no knowledge of except in a very general way. We have had no investigation, but, in my opinion, immense changes have been made. Immediately after this new move was made upon the stock of the Union Pacific Company and Jay Gould and Sidney Dillon and others became largely interested in it, they came before the Senate committee and claimed that in consequence of the competition of the road which runs from Denver to Salt Lake and eastward from Denver to Omaha, the Union Pacific could not possibly pay much more than fixed charges and current expenses, except it might keep up probably with the requirements of the sinking fund, it might put something in that.

That subject was discussed before us very briefly and at the same time with a great deal of force, a great deal of zest by the gentlemen concerned. Immediately I saw that the Union Pacific Railroad Company was getting into trouble. Disorganization seems to have occurred in regard to the personnel of the management of the road: men were removed and others were put in their places; why, nobody knew. It was perhaps not any of our business at that time to find out; but since that time the stocks and bonds of the Union Pacific Company have been the subject of marked speculation in Wall street, and I do not know but that the Senator from New Jersey is entirely right when he says an arrangement has been made by which the assets of the Union Pacific have been taken and put in pledge to persons who owned the stock of the road, because they advanced money for the payment of the current obligations. That may be all so. I believe it is, but I do not know it.

These gentlemen told us that they could not accept the proposition that Mr. Adams had been so careful to make to us and had advocated with such marked ability—he and Mr. Story, his legal adviser—a proposition which the gentlemen evidently acted upon as one entitled to the recognition of good conscience. We agreed to it and felt very happy over it, that we had found a solution which would practically be satisfactory to everybody concerned. Mr. Adams had the full confidence of that committee. But immediately after the Senate had refused to take up the bill here and pass upon it Mr. Adams was removed from the presidency of that road and another man came in and then the whole programme was changed. They said they could not do what Mr. Adams had promised to do, and would not undertake it. Thereupon Mr. Huntington became still more clamorous on behalf of his road for larger indulgences, and our brother STANFORD, of the Senate, was demanding a recoupment in the way of damages for losses that they had sustained in building it up. They must have been immense, considering how little he has now!

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state in justice to Mr. Huntington that he said to the committee, having agreed to do a certain thing while he was very desirous that something better should be offered by the committee, he would hold himself as bound by his agreement if the committee said so.

Mr. MORGAN. That is, provided we should also deal with the Union Pacific?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. But then the Union Pacific had fallen back in the harness and would not move. We could not get them to move abreast. When the Union Pacific was ready to go ahead,

Mr. Huntington was not. He said he was not. He objected to the bill, and I think the Senator from Nevada objected to the bill here that we reported for the Union Pacific because Mr. Huntington was not included in it.

Mr. FRYE. That was the first report.

Mr. STEWART. He wanted to go on, and urged legislation.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all; the Union Pacific bill he did not want unless his road was included, and when we did include it the Union Pacific was not ready to go ahead. It was a see-saw; they were never moving abreast.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, it was entirely the fault of Congress that a settlement was not made on the joint bill which was reported by the committee. A hearing could not be obtained before Congress on that bill, and if it had been obtained at that time the settlement would have been made, I have no doubt.

Mr. MORGAN. That may be. I am very sorry it could not be done if that would have been the result, for this question has got to be settled in some way. But now new men appear upon the theater with new ideas and new demands, and so I think it will be until past 1897, or up to a very close approach to that period, when a general plea of insolvency or bankruptcy will be entered here and it will be insisted that we shall compromise with these railroad companies by taking the principal of the debt and letting the interest go by the board.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I do not know whether this is quite applicable, but I find in the report of the minority member of the commission appointed by President Cleveland a summary of what he called branch lines of the Union Pacific Railroad which did not pay. I will not take time to read any of it but the headings. He says:

A study of the branch lines of the company reveals the following:
Six roads abandoned to creditors.

He then gives the names of those roads, and another heading is:

Eight roads that did not pay operating expenses in 1889.

And he gives the names of those. Then another heading is:

Ten roads that failed to pay fixed charges.

Then he gives the names of those. Then there is a list of "eight roads on which profit was made." I suppose those roads are involved in this controversy, more or less. I do not know whether they are or not.

Mr. MORGAN. No, they are not.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought I would call the attention of the Senator to that statement and see whether there was any explanation made of it. I confess I do not know.

Mr. MORGAN. Those roads had evidently disappeared. They had disappeared before the committee went out there to examine the subject, except perhaps two of them. I think there were only two when we were out there which were considered as being a sort of encumbrance upon the trunk line. Am I not correct about that, I ask the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FRYE. Of course this was a long while ago that we investigated it, but my recollection is that there were three or four roads that did not pay as roads by themselves, but owing to their position as feeders to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific they did pay those roads.

Mr. DAWES. Indirectly?

Mr. FRYE. Indirectly they paid those roads, while they did not pay themselves. They received only a certain proportion of the net earnings. The Union Pacific, if it was one of their roads, received a certain proportion, and that proportion received by the Union Pacific was clear gain to the Union Pacific. It was the opinion of the committee that, I think, all of these roads were profitable roads to the Union Pacific, and hence profitable to the Government of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right. That was the conclusion.

Mr. CULLOM. They were purchased or built, I understand, for the purpose of strengthening the business of the trunk lines.

Mr. FRYE. Of the trunk lines.

Mr. CULLOM. Yet a large number of them seem to have been unable to sustain themselves.

Mr. FRYE. There were two or three very noticeable failures that the Union Pacific gave up and let go.

Mr. MORGAN. Those failures were due to the fact I have adverted to already, that mines were supposed to be discovered that were valuable, and they attracted travel in that direction. The railroads would send out spurs or branches to these mines or in the direction of them in the hope of getting traffic. Then the mines would be abandoned, and the railroad would go by the board. There is no agriculture around there.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine says that the Congress of the United States is to be blamed for not having settled this question in the last Congress, and I agree with him. At the same time, the gentlemen who brought questions forward which supplanted this very important proposition and drove it out of the Senate Chamber and out of the other House, too, are perhaps more to blame than others for that result.

We find, however, another thing that is preventing Congress from acting. Here we have progressed fully one-half, or it may be two-thirds, in the depths of this session and we have taken no action upon this case at all. There has not been a meeting of this committee. I know the chairman of the committee would would have called us together if he had had the slightest hope of any result of legislation from this body or from the other House during the present session. He saw at once that it could not be done, and therefore he has not done it. The reason why it could not be done is the same reason that applies to many other things that we have to consider here in treating of measures and deferring measures.

A Presidential election is coming on, and neither side, it is apparent, wants to take the responsibility of handling these great railroad corporations in the way that they deserve to be handled. The committee was thoroughly convinced—and we are convinced, I have no doubt, to-day—of the absolute ability of the Union Pacific Railroad to pay its debt in fifty years without the loss of a shilling to the United States. I do not believe that a better security has been offered for a railroad in the history of the United States than that which was proposed by the Union Pacific committee and reported to this body by the select committee and ratified by that company.

Mr. PLATT. I was upon the Committee on the Pacific Railroads—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BATE in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. It will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution by Mr. JONES of Arkansas, relative to the President's message of February 18, 1892.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily, not to lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be done, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say that although not now on that committee, I was at the time the report was made, and I was entirely satisfied at that time that the Union Pacific Railroad were from appearances and conditions then able to carry out the settlement which was proposed; but although not on the committee I have some doubt about whether they are able now to carry out the proposed plan.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a little doubt about that myself, that they are now able to carry out the proposed plan, but I think it has been because of the butchery of the road since new men came in there. Whether they wanted to butcher it in order to finally capture it I do not know, but they are very skillful people. I do not see any falling away in the general prosperity of that region of the world. There is an increase of prosperity, an increase of industries, an increase in the yield of crops, mines, and everything else, and I see no reason why the Union Pacific under such management as Mr. Adams gave to it would not be perfectly solvent and able to pay out all its obligations to the United States Government. I believe it would be entirely able to pay all its debts in full and keep all of its property.

Mr. President, that brings me to a matter that I wish to state my opinion upon, for which nobody is responsible but myself. I have conversed with some friends about it, but I have not attempted to extract any opinions from them at all. My belief is, that when we come to the time when we are forced to settle with these railroads we shall find ourselves in a condition where we shall be compelled to make a compromise with them, at least, upon the terms of the payment of the original amount of money loaned by us, without interest—less than one-half of what is actually due to us.

More than likely we shall have to take these railroads into court and have a receiver appointed, if we allow the laws to stand just as they are, and have a marshaling of assets as between the prior creditors and the deferred creditors; and we shall have to devise some scheme, which I suppose will result in an appropriation of money enough out of the Treasury of the United States to pay off what is now, but was not originally, the antecedent mortgages, which amount to the same sum exactly as the whole debt, without interest, of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads, guaranteed by the United States. In the mean time these railroads will be worked for private advantage, as they are every day, in the stock markets of the United States, and we can not control that.

We have not any more power to-day over the Union and Central Pacific Railroads, in consequence of the fact that we have two Government directors there, than if we did not have any directors at all. They do with this road just as they please, and if they make a pro forma compliance with the requirements of the Thurman act, that is as far as they go. But that fund is yielding nothing of any consequence to the ultimate redemption of these bonds and interest.

Mr. FRYE. The Thurman act was an utter failure.

Mr. MORGAN. I should say it was an utter failure. Probably it has made seven or eight hundred thousand dollars out of the whole fund that has been intrusted to the keeping of the Secretary of the Treasury; but you might call it in that sense an utter failure, because the amount of money that was put in there ought to have yielded by this time, on compounded loans or interest, a very large sum.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I understood him to make a suggestion that it might be necessary for the Government to put these roads into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. MORGAN. As the law is now; but not as I would make it if I could gain the support of the Houses of Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator if the Government claim is not a second-mortgage claim?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. What, then, would be the condition of the United States in putting these roads into the hands of a receiver, the Government being in the position of second mortgage? Would it not virtually compel the Government to assume the first-mortgage debt?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it would. That is what I think would be the result of it all if we let it go along just as it is. I do not see how we are going to escape it.

Mr. FRYE. How can it do anything without assuming the first-mortgage debt?

Mr. MORGAN. It can not do anything the way the thing is now going without assuming the first-mortgage debt, because that stands in the front of the rights of the United States. We have got to pay that off anyway before we can realize anything whatever out of the assets of the company on which we have any lien.

Mr. CHANDLER. Would any wise creditor under such circumstances, holding a second mortgage, think of pushing the debtor's property into the hands of a receiver with a large first mortgage staring the creditor in the face all the time?

Mr. MORGAN. If the man had money enough to control the first mortgage without sustaining any particular damage he might be willing to do that and take the chances of a better outcome. If a creditor were rich enough he could pay off the first mortgage and become subrogated to that lien, with all of its advantages. It might be a fine speculation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, if willing to pay the first mortgage. That first mortgage of these roads amounts to about how much?

Mr. FRYE. To about the same as our debt.

Mr. CHANDLER. Fifty or sixty million dollars, the principal?

Mr. MORGAN. The same number of dollars as the debt. I am stating, upon the existing condition of affairs as fixed now by the law of the land, what must be the future condition of this property and these railroads. The United States Government, by a simple act of amendment of the charter of these two railroad companies which need not be more than ten lines of legislation, can manage this whole matter with perfect justice to itself, to the bondholders, the stockholders, and the people, and we ought to do it.

Why do we want two directors in the board of directors of these companies, which shall not be less than fifteen, with any upward limit at all? What were these two directors of the United States to do there? Were they put there as spies to look on and see what the conduct of the company might be? They must have been intended to fulfill that delicate office and no other, because they had not any voice that was sufficient to make any impression upon the management or destiny of these companies.

We wanted those directors there because we wanted to reserve to the Government of the United States a voice in the directory. Now, the question arises, how great a voice in the directory ought we to have? I am convinced that we ought to have ten out of the fifteen directors, and that the act ought to be so amended as to give us ten out of the fifteen directors, and those ten directors to be chosen ought to be ten of the best men who can be found in the United States, the highest in character and reputation, the wisest in their experiences, and greatest in their practical ability.

I would have the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint those ten directors, and I would give them $10,000 salary a year, and pay them out of the treasury of the company. Besides that I would pay their traveling expenses. Then I would enact that they should not be bondholders or stockholders in any railroad whatsoever, or in any canal, or in any telephone or telegraph company; that they should be men who would be entirely free from corporate influence. Then I would have the ten divided equally between the two great leading parties of the United States so as to make the board nonpolitical.

Then I would say to these men: "You are the directors of this railroad. Take care of it for the benefit of the stockholders, for the benefit of the creditors—the United States being one—for the benefit of the people. See that justice is done in all of its operations. Take care of it and promote its interests so that it will become day by day or year by year a better property. See that it is faithfully and honestly administered."

If your railroad corporation commits a trespass or inflicts an injury upon anybody upon which an action of tort could be sustained, it is not the Government of the United States that is liable; it is the railroad company under this body of directors, and the Government is no more responsible with ten directors in the board for the acts of this corporation than it is with two. So there is no direct responsibility between the Government of the United States and any person who may be affected in any way whatsoever by the management of the corporation under the ten directors I propose.

Now, what would be the result? I would enable those directors to go on and make any deal or transaction that would be beneficial to the companies, either in the way of postponing by agreement or buying up the antecedent liens, or in getting rid of the embarrassment of debts in any fair way, or by leasing or selling the property to any companies that might be able to buy it; but not one of such contracts relating to the disposal of the property and property rights of this railroad of the character to which I refer should become binding until Congress had passed upon it. I would provide that they should report to Congress every change that they propose to make, and with these restrictions I would give them carte blanche to deal with these railroads.

Under such a plan you would have all the benefit of a receiver or receivers under your direction as much as the receiver of a court would be, without responsibility, and the character of the men and the control that Congress would exercise over them for the benefit of the people at large would prevent them from doing anything to the injury of the people at large or to the injury of the corporation or its property, or to the injury of the United States or any creditor. If we are to be forced to buy these roads or else to have a court to put them in the control of receivers, let us make Government directors our receivers and direct them and govern them and protect them by acts of Congress.

These great trunk lines are held by the Supreme Court to be agencies of the Government of the United States—Government instrumentalities—and we can not abdicate our control of them into the hands of a court or its receiver. Without the consent of Congress no creditor of these roads can foreclose a mortgage upon these railroads. Such a suit would be against the United States as a necessary party, because these railroads are instrumentalities of Government.

I believe, Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States had the courage to-day simply to amend that charter and to appoint ten directors out of the fifteen, as it has a perfect right to do, in that board and give them such general instructions by resolution as might be considered necessary, we would compass the settlement of this whole business, save the property for the stockholders who would commence realizing dividends; we would lift burdens off the people, and we would increase the prosperity of the Pacific coast and all the country lying between here and there immediately. It is easy to do. But if you wait until Mr. Huntington and Mr. Jay Gould get ready to deal with you they will only be ready to begin when your property has shrunk so that it is hardly worth taking up and nobody else will have it but them. That will be the situation; and right into that gulf we are now driving, without other hope of deliverance.

We found it impossible in the last Congress, because of the force bill and the tariff bill, to gain any consideration for a measure that the committees had agreed upon, which was just in itself and would have settled this question, and now at this Congress we find it impossible even to get a committee meeting upon it, because there is a Presidential election coming on. When are we going to settle it and who is going to settle it? Who is going to take the responsibility of the settlement? This settlement is a matter that ought to be the subject of negotiations during the five years to come before the entire debt will mature, and men ought to be empowered under our control to go forward and handle this property in such a way as that the settlement when it was made should be satisfactory to all concerned.

To that full extent, Mr. President, I am in favor of the Government of the United States taking control of these railroads. More than that, I would not have this money to come back into the Treasury of the United States just now. I do not care how long it remains out, provided that while it is out it is accomplishing the same sort of work that it is doing now and has done heretofore. The one hundred and ten or one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty million dollars that are now represented by that loan and the interest upon it have done for the United States Government more to improve the country than any one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty million dollars ever spent under the laws of this country; and the Congress of the United States would not for $300,000,000 give up these railroad lines connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific. Whether the laws under which these constructions were made were wise or unwise, at the time, or appeared to be so, whether just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional, Democratic or Republican, yet that money went out and found its way into these railroads and did for this country a work that $113,000,000, that sum of money three times multiplied, can ever do for it again.

Mr. President, as that money is out of the Treasury the question is when shall it come back? That is not a Democratic question. It is not a Republican question. It is a question simply of policy. Shall we call it in before it has done any more work? I say that inasmuch as it is out of the Treasury, if we can secure it under proper conditions, and if at the proper time we can employ it as a fund for doing that which the Democrats and Republicans in this Chamber can not but agree to have done, and which is of the utmost importance to this country, such as digging a canal around from Buffalo to Lake Ontario, on American soil, we will thereby settle a national question of the highest importance.

As the money is out, is not in the Treasury, and as the people are not to be taxed to raise it, as all that is required of us is that we shall have a proper system for the collection of it, why not put it to use and make it build that work before it gets back into the Treasury, or make it build some other work, like the Nicaragua canal, if you please, before it gets back into the Treasury? It has done vast good for this country, and can do a great deal more. It is a fund to be relied upon, a fund about the use of which there can scarcely be a dispute upon Democratic or Republican grounds, upon constitutional grounds or any other.

It is a tool of work lying there ready to be handled by the people and Government of the United States for great and beneficial public purposes; and I would very much rather, when it is collected together or is being collected together, that it was put to work in some other great national enterprise, than that it should be covered into the Treasury, for we do not need it there. It is very true that just at this moment of time the Republican party have run us down to a very low ebb, and there appears to be a good deal of doubt about whether we can pay our bills. There is a great deal of juggling about it, but that will grow better. Our country is advancing; it is growing in prosperity all the time. We can overcome almost any difficulty in the condition of the Treasury, simply by the strength of our natural growth.

So we are in no danger about that, and we need not bring this money back into the Treasury just now, like we did the sixty odd million dollars of bank reserves in the McKinley bill for the purpose of bridging over troubles in the Treasury and getting more money to spend. We need not do that. There is no occasion for it. Let us leave it out as an improvement fund, and as we draw it in let us find some great national purpose, to which we can apply it in this country, that we all want to accomplish, and about which we would have constitutional doubts and qualms, perhaps, if the question was one of the first intention of appropriating the money out of the Treasury to be raised by taxing the people. It is a fund like that arising from the public lands. It is a fund of the sort we have got the right to resort to. It is outstanding, and let us use it while it is there.

But, Mr. President, we will not have this question settled by any bargain that Congress can make. If we now propose to have a legislative agreement between Mr. Gould and Mr. Huntington and Mr. Sidney Dillon, and so and so, whoever may be interested in the stocks and bonds of this company, we will not reach a conclusion. We have tried it long enough, and I shall introduce a bill in the Senate when I get an opportunity to do so, for the purpose of taking the practical control of both of these railroads out of the hands of the corporations, to the extent of appointing a Government directory to go there and take them and work them, so as to devote their earnings, under good and just management, to the payment of their debts and the improvement of the railroads.

Mr. President, this is very much more than I intended to say at the outset about this matter, but I think it is all germane to the proposed amendment to the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I have but a word to say, and that in supplement to the first portion of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Reference has been made to the Fort Worth, Denver and Union Pacific road, now operated by the Union Pacific Company. That road was formed by the consolidation of three separate organizations, two in Texas and one in Colorado. The original road in Colorado was the Denver and New Orleans, running from Denver to Pueblo. It met reverses, and was reorganized as the Denver, Texas and Gulf. Then that road, incorporating with the Fort Worth and Denver and the Denver and Fort Worth, I think, two other roads, came together as one organization.

It was a great and an important feeder for Colorado and for Texas. It was a medium whereby the great lumber interests of Oregon were made to serve the section of the country through which it passed, and was also a channel whereby the cattle from the South were brought to the North. Its earnings were slight. They are now small. Standing by itself it was hardly able to support itself. The Union Pacific road looking it over found that it could assist that enterprise and that in turn the enterprise would be a valuable feeder for it. The stockholders of the Fort Worth road are many in number. One portion of it was built by Colorado people. Its stock and its bonds are largely held there. The Union Pacific has a certain interest in its stock and bonds, but the holding of the stock of the company, now leased to the Union Pacific Company, is large and extended.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] suggested that there was some secrecy about the leases or contracts whereby these different companies did business. It is a great mistake, Mr. President. There is no secrecy. Everybody knows what that lease is. If I had half an hour I could ascertain its terms. The matter has been published and circulated, and there are thousands of people who know the exact condition of the lease. But they have no more to do with the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad than they have with an English railway in India—not a bit. The terms and conditions of this lease are based upon a proportion of the earnings of the road which are to go to the stockholders of the Fort Worth Company. I have no doubt in the world that if the Union Pacific Company as lessee of the Fort Worth Company should carry the troops of the United States over that leased line and the Government of the United States should then lay its hands upon the money which was coming to it for that purpose and should apply it to the debt due to the Union Pacific Company, the stockholders of the Fort Worth Company could sue the Union Pacific and get a judgment for the amount of money so earned in carrying the troops and munitions of war over its line of road. There is no doubt of it.

It is no defense to a lessee company which agrees to pay a certain rental that some measure is applied in taking those earnings so that a judgment can not be had for it. I can imagine no more inequitable and brutal and unjust attempt to injure and cripple enterprises which are building up the Western section of the country than such a probably unconstitutional attempt on the part of the Senate to say to a road which is in no way whatever concerned with the relations between the Union Pacific Company and the Government, whatever you may earn, because you are operated by the Union Pacific, shall be applied to the debt due another company.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] in the few remarks he made, addressing himself to the Senator from Alabama, suggested that there had been some enormous robbery or steal by the Union Pacific Company of late days and by some method, illegitimate and wicked, some floating debt had been created. I think it is a mistake to treat the Union Pacific Company or any other railroad company as a public enemy. I do not know the exact facts as to the accumulation of this debt. I believe that it arose by reason of some purchases and some extensions in Oregon. Legitimately and properly bonds were to be issued to pay for these improvements and extensions and benefits, all of which were a material help to the Union Pacific Company proper, and all of which added to the value of the property upon which the Government had its lien.

But bad times came. The bonds could not be placed, and this floating debt stood as a menace to the property of the company. In order to raise money to tide itself over it was compelled to use in the markets of New York not only the securities which it had to offer but such other securities as by its own wise and careful management it had in its treasury to apply for purposes of this loan, and those are the securities which are now held in New York, not by stockholders of the company necessarily, but by the general public. There are thousands and tens of thousands of people who at the price quoted in New York have purchased these securities. I understand that there has been no scheme, no wickedness in connection with the transaction.

The Union Pacific Company in the past must be blamed for very great and wicked management. Its policy now towards certain of the manufacturing centers of the West, towards certain cities of the West, is to my mind unfair and unjust, but is largely brought about by the inequalities of the interstate commerce law. But whatever condition the Union Pacific Company may be in to-day has been accompanied by the utmost integrity of its management.

That company is now in deep water. Whether it will pull out of its troubles I do not know, but I do know that a receivership and a foreclosure of that vast corporation would be the most deplorable thing that could happen to the Northwest. So far as

I am concerned I am unwilling to add by my vote to the burdens of that company, and to say in the most unjust and to my mind unconstitutional fashion, "the companies which you operate under lease, with which the public is interested, where you have as shareholders men who have no connection whatever with your property, shall be taken from you and made to apply upon a debt which you will in time owe to the Government of the United States."

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, a single word with respect to the criticism of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Wolcott] upon some remarks of mine this morning.

I did state, and I stated upon what I thought excellent authority, to wit, the authority of the Railroad Commissioner, who I presume has full knowledge of the facts, there had been a floating debt of the Union Pacific Railroad Company which had been guaranteed to be paid by a certain syndicate in New York, and in order to secure that syndicate it had turned over the property and assets in the treasury of the Union Pacific Railroad, consisting of bonds and stock upon these branch lines of road of which they are virtually the owners, to this syndicate to secure the debt. If I understand correctly, the amount there was about $18,000,000 of floating debt.

First, it is proper for us to consider exactly how that floating debt was made; whether it is legal and proper under the Thurman act.

I turn to the report of the commissioners appointed under the late Administration of Mr. Cleveland, who were authorized and instructed by act of Congress to investigate all these matters relating to these railroad corporations and report the result of their investigation to Congress. I do not wish to go into any lengthy discussion of this question, but I will only cite two or three cases which I think will give the Senate a fair idea of how this floating debt was made up; and then it will be for the Senate to decide whether a debt so constituted, in violation of the acts of Congress, can now be brought in and given a prior importance over even the first-mortgage bonds of the road.

That is what it virtually would amount to. If there is any deficiency after the sale of the security, I think, under the decisions of all our courts, it has been held, when money has been expended through receiverships or otherwise for labor, equipment, and things of that kind in the operating expenses of a railroad, it even supersedes all the bonded obligations of the line. I think that is a well-established principle of law.

Now, Mr. President, we turn to page 163 of this report, made by a railroad commissioner, in order that we may ascertain exactly how at least a portion of this deficiency or floating debt which this syndicate has assumed was made up. From the minority report of the commission:

In 1882 and 1884, without leave of Congress, the Union Pacific guaranteed the faithful performance by the Oregon Short Line of its contract and lease of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, and guaranteed the payment of interest on the bonds of the Oregon Short Line to the amount of over $14,000,000, at a large annual loss, which was borne by the Union Pacific.

The Union Pacific guaranteed, without leave of Congress, the interest on the bonds of the St. Joseph and Grand Island Railroad, amounting to $6,961,912.22.

At various times since the passage of the act of 1873—

It means the act of 1878—

the Union Pacific has obligated itself to advance moneys toward the building of other railroads and has expended over $38,000,000 in such construction.

Meaning the branch lines. It can mean nothing else.

It has lent its credit to various corporations for the purpose of evading the requirements of the act of 1873.

As printed; intended to be 1878—which prohibited any pledge of its property or future earnings. It has created new corporations, in which it was the only stockholder, and through these new corporations it has done, by indirection, what it was prohibited by act of Congress from doing—paying out about $1,500,000 a year to make up deficiencies in the fixed charges of some of these auxiliary corporations.

And so on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Senator reading from the report of the Commission or from the minority report?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am reading from the report of one of the members of the Commission.

Mr. FRYE. The minority?

Mr. MITCHELL. The minority report, made by Governor Pattison.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well; what criticism has the Senator to make with respect to that report?

Mr. MITCHELL. None whatever. I simply desired to know whether the Senator was reading from the majority or the minority report.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I have never read in public a word from the majority report, and I should be ashamed to do it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know about that. My only object in inquiring was simply for my own information to ascertain whether it was from the majority or minority report that the Senator was reading.

Mr. McPHERSON. What I wish to say is that in my judgment from all the investigations that I have ever made of this case from reports, comparing the report of the majority of this board with all former reports made, comparing it with all the knowledge that the Senate and Congress have ever had upon this subject, whether it may be creditable or discreditable to the administration of Mr. Cleveland, it was the most strange and extraordinary effort that I have ever yet seen of how not to do it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not criticising any portion of the report, so far as I am concerned. I only wanted to know the fact.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well; I read from the report of Mr. Pattison, one of the members of the commission on the Pacific railroads, and I think the president or chairman of the board.

Mr. Pattison does not state an untruth with respect to the practices of these companies, with respect to the alienation of the moneys, the credits, the income, the assets in possession of the company, because if they had never been in the possession of the company they could not have been expended by the company for the purposes and objects here named. These assets and incomes have been converted into what? Into new railroad lines and new securities. The new securities are now where? In the hands of a syndicate in the city of New York, who have taken upon themselves the responsibility of guaranteeing the floating debt made up from these deficiencies.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The minority member of that commission does not state what is a fact, that the possession of the Oregon Short Line and the Oregon Navigation Company were an absolute necessity to the successful life of the Union Pacific Railroad, and that without them the Government of the United States would be utterly hopeless in its endeavor to recover from the Union Pacific Railroad. It does not state these facts. He simply states in his report everything that he could find and everything that his imagination could suggest against the two railroad corporations. The Senator said he had never read, and thanked fortune he had not, a word of the majority report.

Mr. McPHERSON. In public.

Mr. FRYE. In public. I ask him if he has read the majority report in private.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have read it several times. I have studied it over from beginning to end.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator know the recent transaction by which some of the securities were taken in order to protect a syndicate for an advance of a large sum of money to pay certain debts of the Union Pacific Railroad? It is a recent transaction. Does the Senator know from the parties to that transaction or from anybody what that debt was and how it was made up?

Mr. McPHERSON. Well, it is only called a floating debt of the road.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator know whether part of it came from the absolute necessity of a very large increase in the rolling stock to do the business which was pouring in upon the road from the increased crop of a year ago?

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will take the annual receipts and expenditures of the Union Pacific Railroad for the ordinary running expenses and for any betterment he will find that this sum of eighteen or twenty million dollars never could have been made up from any such deficiency whatever.

Mr. FRYE. I was asking the Senator if he has any knowledge in relation to it at all?

Mr. McPHERSON. I have only this knowledge about it. The fact is notorious. The newspapers of New York have been full of it during the entire summer. The thing was discussed there pro and con. The fact was made plain and apparent to every man who would read the newspapers that there was a debt of eighteen or twenty million dollars; that a syndicate of New York bankers had undertaken to take care of this debt; and that they had been secured by the securities then in the treasury of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

I have undertaken from this report to show first how this deficiency originated and what made the floating debt. Now, then, the securities are no longer in the possession of the Union Pacific Railroad, but in case of the failure of the Union Pacific Company to pay this debt of eighteen or twenty million dollars on the maturity of the obligation which has been given, then these securities unquestionably, according to Wall street practices, become the property of the syndicate.

As to the effect of this whole matter, if I understand the meaning of certain statements that I heard yesterday that these assets were now the property of individuals—in other words, in the claim made by me, that inasmuch as the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads were the owners of these branch lines the same rule should apply to the parent line and the branch roads alike. I have somewhere heard it stated that these securities were held not by the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads but by the public. If this syndicate shall be taken and accepted as a public ownership in these securities, under the circumstances stated, then that view is correct, but not otherwise.

There is a very large sum of these branch-line securities which in the report made by the Senator from Maine are given an extraordinary value. To a friend of these railroad companies desiring that this new adjustment should be made, that a new subsidy bill should be passed by Congress, I can see a reason in attempting to make it appear that these securities are of great value and are an additional security to the Government debt. But, however, the syndicate have them.

If this floating debt of eighteen or twenty million dollars has arisen by reason of a deficiency in the running account of the Union Pacific Railroad, then the natural effect of it is that these people are at perfect liberty under the decisions of our courts to sell out this entire railroad property, if they can not get any more out of it than $20,000,000, and to force the sale at any time.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I want to say. I may add by way of context, however, that it seems impossible to procure any kind of adjustment of these matters or, at the present time, any kind of legislation which will compel these companies to do exact justice.

Perhaps, while upon my feet, I may as well reply to the point raised by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], in which he took the ground that if the Union Pacific Railroad Company had not leased or purchased the Oregon Short Line, giving them a route to the Pacific Ocean, the Government could never have collected any part of its debt against the Union Pacific Railroad. In other words, the Union Pacific, without the Oregon Short Line, was a road starting from the Missouri River and running into the wilderness, having no connection and no terminal point. By connecting with that line the Oregon Short Line, it is said, reaches the Pacific Ocean.

Now, what was the original intention of Congress? The original idea of Congress when this legislation was passed was that these large grants of land, of credit, and of money were given to these two corporations—the Union and Central Pacific roads—in order that a continuous line of railroad should be made between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean. Why, then, does the Senator from Maine say that there was no westerly route from Ogden for the Union Pacific Railroad to reach the Pacific Ocean except by the leasing of the Oregon Short Line? Why did not Congress, by legislation, compel the Central Pacific Railroad to keep up its connection with the Union Pacific, and to give and receive freights and passengers from one line to the other as it was intended by every act of Congress?

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am bothered about it myself a little. Suppose this amendment of the committee should be voted down and the provision of the House should stand, who is going to determine in withholding this money, or in paying it out, as the case may be, what particular lines are embraced in the Southern Pacific system?

What kind of legislation is this? Is it now determined, is there any record that defines what particular lines constitute the Pacific system of the Central Pacific? If not, how is it to be determined? These are nonaided lines. They are to be included, but they are no part of the record, as I understand it, of the Government.

Mr. McPHERSON. Confessedly no member of the committee is ready to give us any information respecting it. Now, what does the House of Representatives propose to do, and what do those of us who think as I do in the Senate propose to do? We propose to keep this money in the public Treasury until some tribunal shall be found that will determine the exact status of this company.

Mr. MITCHELL. But you propose to withhold money from certain lines of railroad which according to this bill it is impossible to tell whether the Southern Pacific or the Central Pacific or the Union Pacific have any interest in whatever.

Mr. McPHERSON. No.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. While that point is under discussion I will ask leave to offer an amendment which I think will meet the objection made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri move to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. VEST. I move it as an amendment to the text of the bill. I move to perfect the language proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 25, after the word "by,"

it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the proviso and insert:

Any railway company or corporation which is indebted to the United States by reason of the aid heretofore given by the Government to such company or corporation, but the amount due from the Government for transportation on lines owned, controlled, or operated by said company or corporation shall be credited upon the indebtedness of said company or corporation to the United States.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided further. That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled, or operated by any railway company or corporation which is indebted to the United States by reason of the aid heretofore given by the Government to such company or corporation, but the amount due from the Government for transportation on lines owned, controlled, or operated by said company or corporation shall be credited upon the indebtedness of said company or corporation to the United States.

Mr. McPHERSON. Ought it not to include the mail transportation?

Mr. VEST. This bill does not deal with the question of the mails. I simply adopt the language of the provision in the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri desire a vote upon his amendment now?

Mr. VEST. I offer the amendment now, and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. STEWART. It is a substitute for the proviso?

Mr. VEST. No; it strikes out part of the text of the bill and inserts the words which have been read.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator proposes to amend the text before the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is voted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. STEWART. Before the vote is taken, as there has been so much talk about the committee not having given information, I stated that no information had been given as to the reason why this provision is constitutional. This question has been before the Court of Claims and before the Supreme Court. It arose on the second section of the Thurman act, which is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the whole amount of compensation which may from time to time be due to said several railroad companies respectively for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States, one-half thereof to be presently applied to the liquidation of the interest paid and to be paid by the United States upon the bonds so issued by it as aforesaid to each of said corporations severally, and the other half thereof to be turned into the sinking fund hereinafter provided for the uses herein mentioned.

The language itself was as broad as it could very well be made, standing by itself. The court say:

Taken wholly by itself the language of this section is broad enough to sustain the position urged on behalf of the defendants. But that is a narrow and superficial view, not to be adopted if the words can be otherwise so interpreted as not to conflict with contract relations and constitutional limitations. The act was passed "to alter and amend the act of 1862 and the act of 1864."

Then they go on to explain those acts. This language covered the case, but the court said that the act must be taken in pari materia, and that it should not be construed by itself, but must be construed together. The Supreme Court got hold of the same proposition. After discussing the acts in pari materia, showing that there was doubt and that the fair construction might be not to include what was contended for, that the Government had a right to withhold compensation on the nonaided roads, the Supreme Court remarked in regard to the right to do that, as to what effect such a construction would have. I read it yesterday, but I will read it again:

There is another view of this controversy which seems to us conclusive. As the contract between the United States and the railroad company contained in the acts of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, has been interpreted by this court to authorize the retention by the Government of compensation for services only on those roads which the United States aided in building, the construction which the appellants seek to put on the second section of the act of May 8, 1878—would not only render that section a breach of faith on the part of the United States but an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellee.

So the Supreme Court have decided that such legislation as is now proposed would be an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellee.

Now, let us see as to the roads that are consolidated and the roads that would be reached by this provision, if no others have been taken into the Pacific system since. I believe there have been a number of other roads taken into the Pacific system. There are consolidated with the Central Pacific—

	Miles.
The California and Oregon Railroad Company	190.08
The Western Pacific Railroad Company (nonaided part)	24.31
The San Joaquin Valley Railroad Company	146.08
The San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad Company	23.20

Making 383.67 miles. Those roads are consolidated with the Central Pacific Railroad. The other roads that are operated under the name of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company are the following:

	Miles.
The Sacramento and Placerville Railroad Company.....	5.64
The Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company.....	49.00
The Northern Railroad Company (including San Pablo and Tulare Railroad Company).....	200.14
The California Pacific Railroad Company.....	115.44
The Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California (including Los Angeles and Wilmington and Mojave to Needles).....	790.38
The Los Angeles and San Diego Railroad Company.....	27.60
The Amador Branch Railroad Company.....	27.05
The Berkeley Branch Railroad Company.....	3.83
The Los Angeles and Independence Railroad Company.....	16.83
The Western Development Company.....	13
The Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Arizona.....	383.21
The Southern Pacific Railroad Company of New Mexico.....	168.26
The Pacific Improvement Company.....	23
The Galveston, Harrisburg, and San Antonio Railroad Company.....	3.61

Making 1,791.35 miles of road that were then operated in that system. I understand it has been extended considerably since this case arose. The Government withheld the compensation for carrying the mails on all these roads under the section of the act which I have read. The Supreme Court first held that it was not intended to be included in that section, and if it was, it was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court have further held that the Government had no right to take the compensation from the non-aided roads. The question came up in the case of The United States vs. The Kansas Pacific Company. A portion of that road was aided by bonds and a portion was not. The question was whether they could demand the 5 per cent and the carrying of half the freight on the nonaided roads of the same company. The Supreme Court held that they could not.

That is a stronger case than this. That is where the same company, the Kansas Pacific Company, part of it aided and part of it not aided, went to the Supreme Court on the question whether the Government could under these acts require the nonaided portion of it, where it was one continuous road and one corporation, to contribute, and the court decided it could not.

Here it is proposed, with regard to the Southern Pacific system, to charge all these roads, without investigating how they are situated, what relation they have, and whether there can ever be any possible obligation on their part. These roads, I understand, were built by bonds issued not by the Central Pacific. The bonds had been issued, and they are indebted to the public for their construction. That is the condition of the Southern Pacific.

Mr. MITCHELL. The stockholders and bondholders, probably a large majority of them, are different persons from the stockholders and bondholders in the aided roads.

Mr. STEWART. Entirely; the bondholders particularly. The bonds have been sold and most of these roads have been constructed with bonds. To undertake to make this settlement on this bill with legislation right in opposition to what the Supreme Court have decided, without any information upon which to base it, it seems to me is wild legislation, and it ought not to go on an appropriation bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I have drawn an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, which I should like to have read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri:

Reserving one-half transportation charges as on the aided lines.

Mr. VEST. As I understand the effect of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, it is simply to place these non-subsidized lines or branches upon the same basis as the aided lines are placed in the Thurman act; in other words, that one-half of the transportation charges are reserved by the Government.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I understand the full import and meaning of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, the effect of it will be that the Government will be authorized to pay these branch lines for all the mileage over their lines full compensation, the same as it would pay to a road which was not aided at all; and then that money is turned into the public Treasury to the credit of the Union Pacific or the Central Pacific Railroad, as the case may be. Claiming as I do that the branch lines are the property of and have been built with the assets and out of the money of the parent line which is aided, as the parent company has turned around and subsidized the branch lines, the same rule should apply to both.

I wish further to state in this connection that in my opinion, from my present view of the case, if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri should be agreed to, the effect will be to relieve the companies to that extent at least of the obligation now existing under the Thurman act. If the Senator will amend his amendment so that it will not relieve the companies from any existing requirements under the Thurman law, then I am perfectly satisfied with his amendment.

Mr. VEST. I think that the Senator from New Jersey is right. I did not intend to release these companies from the payment under the Thurman act. I was proceeding on the same theory that he has adopted, that where roads may be built or leased by the assets of the aided lines we have the right, under the Thurman act, to pass this amendment. That is the logical conclusion in my mind, and unless we adopt that reasoning in regard to it there is no basis for the amendment that I propose or for the House provision. I think the Senator from New Jersey is right about it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then, if that be true, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri should not be passed without the restriction which I have proposed.

Mr. VEST. I agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to accept the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. VEST. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as modified.

Mr. VEST. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the roll is called I wish to ascertain from the Senator from Missouri just what is proposed by the amendment as now modified. What will be the effect upon this transportation of the amendment as modified?

Mr. VEST. If I understand the meaning of the Senator from New Jersey, who offered the amendment to the amendment, it is to put these non-subsidized branches or lines exactly on the basis the main or aided lines are put on by the Thurman act. Fifty per cent of the amount due the Government is reserved for transportation charges.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, 50 per cent of the earnings is reserved by the United States?

Mr. VEST. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so understand the effect of the amendment. I should be glad to have it read again from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 25, of the bill, after the word "by," strike out the remainder of the proviso, and in lieu of the words stricken out insert:

Any railway company or corporation which is indebted to the United States by reason of the aid heretofore given by the Government to such company or corporation, but the amount due from the Government for transportation on lines owned, controlled, or operated by said company or corporation shall be credited upon the indebtedness of said company or corporation to the United States, reserving one-half transportation charges as on the aided lines.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be used in payment of the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over any of the nonbonded lines owned, controlled or operated by any railway company or corporation which is indebted to the United States by reason of the aid heretofore given by the Government to such company or corporation, but the amount due from the Government for transportation on lines owned, controlled, or operated by said company or corporation shall be credited upon the indebtedness of said company or corporation to the United States, reserving one-half transportation charges as on the aided lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] as modified.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (when Mr. HARRIS's name was called). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate and asked me to announce his pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I do not see the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] in his seat. I am paired with him. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. POWER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE], and I withhold my vote unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA. I see no reason why the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] should not transfer his pair with my colleague [Mr. FAULKNER] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], so that both the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] may vote.

Mr. QUAY. I desire merely to protect my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], and on the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. KENNA] I will vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY (when Mr. WARREN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.
Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. COKE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK]. As he has not voted, I understand, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PUGH. Did the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] vote on the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did, the Chair is informed.
Mr. PUGH. I vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT. By an arrangement with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], who is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] and the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will stand paired, so that I can vote. The Senator from Arkansas has already voted. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As I have already voted I will allow my vote to stand. I intended to withdraw it, on account of the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. CASEY. I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and I withdraw my vote, as he is not recorded.

Mr. SAWYER. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. VILAS]. I suggest to the Senator from Florida to transfer his pair to my colleague, which will allow us both to vote.

Mr. CALL. I will then let my vote stand, my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] being transferred to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. SAWYER. I vote "nay," transferring my pair with my colleague [Mr. VILAS] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Secretary will again call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] as modified.

Mr. STEWART. I think we had better take the vote on the final adoption of the proviso. I will offer no further opposition to the adoption of the pending amendment, and then we can take the yeas and nays on the final question to strike out the entire proviso.

Mr. COCKRELL. By unanimous consent the call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of my colleague may be withdrawn and the amendment considered adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection that course will be pursued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the roll will be called on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] as modified.

CHEYENNE AND ARAPAHOE RESERVATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That for reasons set forth in the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the President's message of February 18, 1892, upon the appropriation of March 3, 1891, for payment to Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations or their interest in the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation in the Indian Territory, submitted with this resolution, it is the opinion of the Senate that there is no sufficient reason for interference in the due execution of the law referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not I was in the Senate when that report was made from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I desire to say that I did not concur in that report.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken, I desire that the Secretary may read the message of the President on the subject, which is the basis of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Indian appropriation bill, which was approved March 3, 1891, contains the following provision:

"And the sum of $2,591,450 b. and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians for all the right, title, interest, and claim which said nations of Indians may have in and to certain lands now occupied by the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians under executive order: said lands lying south of the Canadian River, and now occupied by the said Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, said lands have been ceded in trust by article 3 of the treaty between the United States and said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, which was concluded April 28, 1866, and proclaimed on the 10th day of August of the same year, and whereof there remains, after deducting allotments as provided by said agreement, a residue ascertained by survey to contain 2,393,160 acres; three-fourths of this appropriation to be paid to such person or persons as are or shall be duly authorized by the laws of said Choctaw Nation to receive the same, at such time and in such sums as directed and required by the legislative authority of said Choctaw Nation, and one-fourth of this appropriation to be paid to such person or persons as are or shall be duly authorized by the laws of said Chickasaw Nation to receive the same, at such time and in such sums as directed and required by the legislative authority of said Chickasaw Nation; this appropriation to be immediately available and to become operative upon the execution, by the duly appointed delegates of said respective nations specially authorized thereto by law, of releases and conveyances to the United States of all the right, title, interest, and claim of said respective nations of Indians in and to said land (not including Greer County, which is now in dispute), in manner and form satisfactory to the President of the United States; and said releases and conveyances, when fully executed and delivered, shall operate to extinguish all claim of every kind and character of said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians in and to the tract of country to which said releases and conveyances shall apply."

If this section had been submitted to me as a separate measure, especially during the closing hours of the session, I should have disapproved it; but as the Congress was then in its last hours and a disapproval of the general Indian appropriation bill of which it was a part would have resulted in consequences so far-reaching and disastrous that I felt it my duty to approve the bill. But as a duty was devolved upon me by the section quoted, viz: the acceptance and approval of the conveyances provided for, I have felt bound to look into the whole matter, and in view of the facts which I shall presently mention, to postpone any executive action until these facts could be submitted to Congress.

Very soon after the passage of the law it came to my knowledge that the Choctaw Legislature had entered into an agreement with three citizens of that tribe to pay to them as compensation for procuring this legislation 25 per cent of any appropriation that might be made by Congress. The amount to be secured by these three agents, under this agreement, out of the three-fourths interest in the appropriation of the Choctaw Nation, is $560,896. I have information that a contract was made by the Chickasaws to pay about 10 per cent of their one-fourth interest to the agents and attorneys who represented them.

Within a month after the passage of the law, R. J. Ward, one of the agents who was to divide with his two associates the enormous sum to be paid by the Choctaws, presented to me an affidavit dated April 4, 1891, which is herewith submitted. It appears from his statement that the action of the Choctaw council in this matter was corruptly influenced by the execution of certain notes signed by Ward for himself and his associates in sums varying from $2,500 to $15,000. His associates deny any knowledge of this, but the signing and existence of these notes is not refuted. The statement of the two associates of Ward, denying any knowledge of or participation in this fraud, are also submitted, together with other papers relating to the matter.

Whatever may be the fact as to the use or nonuse of corrupt methods to secure this legislation from the Choctaw council, I do not think the Congress of the United States should so legislate upon this matter as to give effect to such a contract, which I am sure must have been unnoticed when the measure was pending. If the relations of these Indians to the United States are those of a ward, Congress should protect them from such extortionate exactions. We cannot assume that the expenses and services of a committee of three persons to represent this claim before Congress could justify such assumptions. The making of such a contract seems to convey implications which, I am sure, are wholly unjust.

After the passage of the appropriation bill legislation was had by the Choctaw Nation looking to the completion of the contract made with their delegates as to the payment of this money, but subsequently, when it was supposed that this extraordinary arrangement might require me to bring the matter to the attention of Congress, an act was passed by the Choctaw general council, approved October 19, 1891, declaring all contracts made by the Choctaw delegates with any attorneys in connection with this appropriation void and of no effect. A copy of this law will be found with the papers submitted. There has also been submitted to me an unofficial copy of the opinion of the attorney-general of the Choctaw Nation, holding that this legislation is unconstitutional and void. I am of the opinion that if this appropriation is to stand provision should be made for protecting these tribes against extortionate claims for compensation in procuring action by Congress.

Copies of the several laws passed by the Choctaw Nation with reference to this matter will be found in the accompanying papers. It will be noticed that the distribution proposed is limited to Choctaws by blood, excluding the freedmen and the white men who have been given full citizenship from any participation. A protest against this method of distribution has been filed by a white citizen of the tribe, and also a representation by Hon. Thomas C. Fletcher, their attorney, on behalf of the freedmen. In view of the fact that the stipulations of the treaty of 1866, in behalf of the freedmen of these tribes, have not, especially in the case of the Chickasaws, been complied with, it would seem that the United States should, in a distribution of this money, have made suitable provision in their behalf. The Chickasaws have steadfastly refused to admit the freedmen to citizenship, as they stipulated to do in the treaty referred to, and their condition in that tribe, and in a lesser degree in the other, strongly calls for the protective intervention of Congress.

After a somewhat careful examination of the question, I do not believe that the lands for which this money is to be paid were, to quote the language of section 15 of the Indian appropriation bill, already set out, "ceded in trust by article 3 of the treaty between the United States and said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, which was concluded April 28, 1866," etc. It is agreed that that treaty contained no express limitation upon the uses to which the United States might put the territory known as the leased district. The lands were ceded by terms sufficiently comprehensive to have passed the full title of the Indians. The limitation upon the use to which the Government might put them is sought to be found in a provision of the treaty by which the United States undertook to exclude white settlers, and in the expressions found in the treaties made at the same time with the Creeks and other tribes of the purpose of the United States to use the lands ceded by those tribes for the settlement of friendly Indians.

The stipulation as to the exclusion of white settlers might well have reference solely to the national lands retained by the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, and the reason for the nonincorporation in the treaty with them of a statement of the purpose of the Government in connection with the use of the lands is well accounted for by the fact that as to these lands the Government had already, under the treaty of 1855, secured the right to use them perpetually for the settlement of friendly Indians. This was not true as to the lands of the other tribes referred to. The United States paid to the Choctaws and Chickasaws $300,000, and the failure to insert the words that are called words of limitation in this treaty points, I think, clearly to the conclusion that the commissioners on the part of the Government and the Indians themselves must have understood that this Government was acquiring something more than a mere right to settle friendly Indians, which is already possessed, and something more than the mere release of the right which the Choctaws and Chickasaws had under the treaty of 1855 to select locations on these lands if they chose.

Undoubtedly it was the policy of this Government for the time to hold these and the adjacent lands as Indian country, and many of the expressions in the proclamations of my predecessors and in the reports of the Indian Bureau and of the Secretary of the Interior mean this and nothing more. This is quite different from a conditional title which limits the grant to a particular use and works a reversion of full title in the Indian grantors when that use ceases. But those who hold most strictly that a use for Indian purposes, where it is expressed, is a limitation of title seem to agree that the United States might pass a fee absolute to other Indian tribes in the lands ceded for their occupancy.

Certainly it was not intended that in settling friendly Indians upon these lands the Government was to be restrained in its policy of allotment and individual ownership. If, for an adequate consideration by treaty, the United States placed upon these lands other Indian tribes, it was competent to give them patents in fee for a certain and agreed reservation. This being so, when the policy of allotment is put into force the compensation for the unused lands should certainly go to the occupying tribe, which in the case supposed had paid a full consideration for the whole reservation.

It will hardly be contended that in such a case this Government should pay twice for the lands. In the appropriation under discussion this principle is in part recognized, for no claim is made by the Choctaws and Chickasaws for the lands allotted to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. The claim is for unallotted or surplus lands. The case of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes is this: In consideration of other lands the Government gave them a treaty reservation in the Cherokee Outlet, but never perfected it by paying the Cheyennes the stipulated price and placing these Indians upon it. The Cheyennes and Arapahoes declined to go upon the strip and located themselves further south, where they now are. The Government subsequently recognized their right to remain there and set apart the lands now being allotted to members of that tribe, and the lands for which payment is now claimed by the Choctaws and Chickasaws, as the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation.

I think the United States must be held to have assented to the substitution of these lands for the treaty lands in the Cherokee Strip, and that being true when the reservation is broken up, as now, by allotments, it would seem that the Cheyennes and Arapahoes were entitled to be compensated for these surplus lands. In fact, a commission which has been dealing with tribes in the Indian Territory has concluded an arrangement with them by which the Government pays $1,500,000 for these surplus lands and for the release of any claim to the Cherokee Strip, so that, in fact, in this agreement with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, the Government has paid for the lands for which payment is now claimed by the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

It should not be forgotten, also, that the allotment to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes is still incomplete. The method of calculation which resulted in stating the claim of the Choctaws and Chickasaws at $2,591,450 is explained by a letter of Mr. J. S. Standley, one of the Choctaw delegates, dated April 6, 1891. The agent for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes wrote Mr. Standley that there were 600 Indians residing upon the lands south of the Canadian River, and who it was supposed would take allotments there, and upon this statement the legislation was based. Now, it must be borne in mind that the Cheyennes and Arapahoes have the right to locate anywhere within their reservation, and that instead of 600, double that number might have taken their allotments south of the Canadian River upon these lands. This is not probable, but a later report indicates that the number will certainly be in excess of 600. If the sum to be paid to the Choctaws and Chickasaws depended upon a knowledge of the number of acres of unallotted land south of the Canadian River, it would seem to have been reasonable that the appropriation should have been delayed until the exact number of acres taken for allotment had been officially ascertained. This has not yet been done.

It is right also, I think, that Congress in dealing with this matter should have the whole question before it; for the declaration of Indian title contained in this item of appropriation extends to a very large body of land and will involve very large future appropriations. The Choctaw and Chickasaw leased district, embracing the lands in the Indian Territory between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degrees of west longitude and extending north and south from the main Canadian River to the Red River, including Greer County, contains, according to the public surveys, 7,713,239 acres, or, excluding Greer County, 6,301,663 acres. This leased district is occupied as follows: Greer County, by white citizens of Texas, 1,511,576 acres. The United States is now prosecuting a case in the courts to obtain a judicial declaration that this county is part of the Indian country. If a decision should be rendered in its favor, the claim of the Choctaws and Chickasaws to be paid for these lands at the rate named in this appropriation would at once be presented.

The Wichita Reservation is also upon the leased lands and is occupied by the Wichitas, Caddoes, Delawares, and remnants of other tribes, by Department orders made to depend upon the treaty with the Delawares in 1866 and some other unratified agreements with tribes or fragments of tribes in 1872. This reservation contains 743,610 acres.

The Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Reservation is occupied by those Indians under a treaty proclaimed August 25, 1868, which provides that said district of country "shall be, and the same is hereby, set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the tribes herein named, and for such friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing (with the consent of the United States) to admit among them." This reservation contains 2,968,893 acres.

The Cheyennes and Arapahoes, whose surplus lands are to be paid for by this appropriation, have occupied the country between the Washita and Canadian Rivers extending west to the one hundredth degree of longitude. This reservation contains 2,489,160 acres.

I have stated these facts in order that it may be seen what further appropriations are involved in a settlement for all these lands upon the basis which Congress has adopted. It does not seem to me to be a wise policy to deal with this question piecemeal. It would have been better, if a remnant of title remains in the Choctaws and Chickasaws to the lands in the leased district, to have settled the whole matter at once. Under the treaty of 1855 the Choctaws and Chickasaws relinquished any supposed interest of theirs in the lands west of the one hundredth degree. The boundary between the Louisiana purchase and the Spanish possessions by our treaty of 1819 with Spain was, as to these lands, fixed upon the one hundredth degree of west longitude.

Our treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, made in 1830, extended their grant to the limit of our possessions. It followed, of course, that these lands were included within the boundaries of the State of Texas when that State was admitted to the Union, and the release of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, whatever it is worth, operated for the benefit of the State of Texas and not of the United States. The lands became public lands of that State. For the release of this claim and for the lease of the lands west of the ninety-eighth degree the Government of the United States paid the sum of $300,000. In the calculations which have been made to arrive at the basis of the appropriation under discussion, none of this sum is treated as having been paid for the lease. I do not think that is just to the United States.

It seems probable that a very considerable part of this consideration must have related to the leased lands, because these were the lands in which the Indian title was recognized and the treaty gave to the United States a permanent right of occupation by friendly Indians. The sum of $300,000, paid under the treaty of 1830, is deducted, as I understand, in arriving at the sum appropriated. It seems to me that a considerable proportion of the sum of $600,000 previously paid should have been deducted in the same manner.

I have felt it to be my duty to bring these matters to the attention of Congress for such action as may be thought advisable.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 17, 1892.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The resolution is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. DOLPH. I call for the yeas and nays on the resolution. I desire to record my vote against it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, in the message of the President just read it is disclosed that the attorneys of the Choctaw Nation are to receive one-quarter of this sum as compensation for their services, the compensation amounting, I believe, to about $600,000. I ask that the Secretary read from page 6 of that document, beginning at the bottom of the page, the statement of the attorneys as to the services they rendered here in Congress in securing the passage of this law.

The Secretary read as follows:

TUSKA HOMMA, CHOCTAW NATION, April 1, 1891.

DEAR SIR: We have the honor to make the following report to you, and through you to the general council of the Choctaw Nation.

On the 23d of September, 1890, we secured the introduction into Congress of "A bill to fully execute article 3 of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians, concluded on the 28th day of April, 1866," accompanied by a favorable report from the House Committee on Indian Affairs. We failed to get a similar report from the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. This was the situation at the close of the first session of the Fifty-first Congress.

The House Committee on Indian Affairs secured from the House of Representatives the 6th day of last December for the consideration of such measures as the committee might desire to present. We managed to get some consideration on the bill before mentioned, but the day closed without the discussion being closed, and a vote could not be taken.

The measure was brought up again on the 10th of December, but the hour of the day was so late the committee thought best to postpone the matter for that day in the hope of getting another day for action on it.

A member of the Committee on Rules was so much opposed to our measure that he prevented the Committee on Indian Affairs from getting another day for the consideration of their measure.

And so the matter dragged along until toward the last days of Congress. When the Indian appropriation bill was presented to the House, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations agreed with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that he (the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations) would not make a "point of order" against the agreement with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and that it might be put upon the Indian appropriation bill.

We knew that it would never do for that bill to go through without carrying an appropriation to pay the Choctaws and Chickasaws for their interest in the lands occupied by the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. It was a critical time for us, and demanded prompt action. We prepared an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, got it introduced into the Senate, and engineered it safely through all the necessary preliminary steps by the time the Indian appropriation bill was reported to the Senate.

Senator JONES of Arkansas proposed our amendment and worked most actively, unselfishly, and determinedly for the passage. We hope it will not be considered out of place here to state that he deserves the thanks of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations for the same. The debate upon the amendment was warm and exciting, but was carried by a safe vote.

The bill, when passed by the Senate, on account of amendments was sent to a conference committee. After considerable trouble the amendment was retained in the conference report.

When the conference report was made to the House it received the bitterest opposition on account of our amendment, but it was fortunately carried safely through. The opposition did not stop then. The bill was followed to the President, so we are informed, and appeals made to him to veto it.

It is not necessary or appropriate here to state the character and extent of our opposition there, then, and now. The public press have given it the most notorious publicity. It is only important now to secure the possession of the money.

With very much respect, your obedient servants,

J. S. STANDLEY,

R. J. WARD,

H. C. HARRIS,

Delegates of Choctaw Nation.

Hon. W. N. JONES,

Principal Chief Choctaw Nation.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make some observations respecting this report.

Mr. PLATT. This matter has a long history, and to set it forth fully will occupy considerable time. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether he desires to speak to-night, or whether he would prefer an adjournment, and take up the resolution in the morning?

Mr. ALLISON. I will adapt myself to the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. The Senate is rather thin.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate is pretty thin at this moment, I agree, and I think if a vote were to be taken to-night it is probable we should not find a quorum present. I shall be guided by the convenience of Senators respecting the matter.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest that we might proceed with the discussion for an hour or so; or, if that is not desired, we might take up the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PLATT. It is very difficult to keep a quorum of the Senate here when matters of such importance are transpiring just outside of the city limits. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion, as I desire to have an executive session.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senator will withdraw it.

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall move an executive session in a moment, unless Senators generally prefer that the matter should go on to-night.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that whatever course is agreeable to the Senator from Iowa shall be taken. I have no desire to press this matter unduly, although it has been delayed now for quite awhile. I should be glad to have it disposed of as rapidly as possible, but I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that it shall go over until to-morrow so that we may have time for discussion and consideration.

Mr. STEWART. The resolution has the right of way now.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas that it is due to all the people who have interest in this matter that it shall be disposed of, and I do not wish to throw any impediments in the way of its speedy disposition; but the provision referred to in the resolution having found a place on the Indian appropriation bill last year under circumstances familiar to the Senate, I desire to state some things respecting the appropriation and the message of the President, just read, before the vote is taken. I think it is a matter of very great importance that the Senate should understand fully the history of this case, especially in the light of the report which appears here as the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] having stated that it does not meet with his approval. In view of the importance of the subject, I desire only the necessary time to say what I think ought to be said on the subject.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not know whether the Senator from Iowa means to suggest that there was anything unfair in the report of the committee coming here without any statement of the views of the minority.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. He says that the Senator from Connecticut, who is a member of the committee, was opposed to it, and the report appears as a unanimous report. I thought perhaps the Senator meant some intimation by making a remark of that sort. The Senator from Connecticut was not in the committee when the vote was taken. Ten of the eleven members were present, and voted for it. The Senator from Connecticut was absent, but we understood in committee that he would have voted against it if present. I should have been glad to have appended his views and to have them printed with the views of the majority if it had been so desired.

I intended to ask when I rose a minute ago if there would be any objection to taking this matter up to-morrow immediately after the disposition of the morning business, so as to devote the entire day to it if that is desired on the part of the Senate? Of course the resolution will not come up regularly until 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. I am perfectly willing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the understanding he has suggested,

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If there is no objection, I should be glad to have that understanding.

Mr. SAWYER. I should rather that we would consider cases on the Calendar until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If there is any objection, I will not press the request.

Mr. ALLISON. We shall get through with it to-morrow.

Mr. SAWYER. Very well, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the pending resolution be taken up to-morrow after the conclusion of the morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLPH. In order that the Senate may have some notice of the consideration of the Senate bill 2409, Order of Business 518, I ask that it may be set for consideration immediately after the unfinished business is disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What is the subject of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. It is a bill to provide for the punishment of violations of treaty rights of aliens, which has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him may be considered in order immediately after the unfinished business is disposed of, being the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 2100) for the relief of Julius C. Zanone, only heir of John B. Zanone, late of Mound City, in Pulaski County, Ill., deceased; and

A bill (S. 2411) for the relief of Lydia A. Magill, administratrix.

The bill (H. R. 4833) to correct the military record of Joseph Wackerly was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 118) to suspend the issue of permits to erect dwelling houses in alleys in the District of Columbia, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FELLOWS, Mr. HEARD, and Mr. COGSWELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the calendar year 1891, 6,000 extra copies, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House, and 3,000 copies for the Director of the Mint.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4464) for the benefit of J. C. Rudd; and

A bill (H. R. 7727) to authorize the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Virginia from Cape Charles to Assateague Island, in aid of the preservation of life and property.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLATT. Is it understood that the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] shall be taken up immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, that is the understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 28, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate April 27, 1892.

CONSUL.

William W. Ashby, of Virginia, to be consul of the United States at Colon (Aspinwall), vice William E. Sims, deceased.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 27, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BUFORD MUSSEN VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Buford Mussen against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

J. T. ABERNETHY VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of the following-named persons vs. the United States: J. T. Abernethy, A. A. Harvey, guardian; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENGINEER CORPS OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER also said before the House a bill (S. 139) terminating the reduction in the numbers of the Engineer Corps of the Navy.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the reduction in the numbers of the Engineer Corps of the Navy provided for in the act approved August 5, 1882, shall be considered as having ceased on the 30th day of June, 1891.

SEC. 2. That any and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker I will say to the gentleman that the House Committee on Naval Affairs have considered this subject and have unanimously reported a bill exactly like this Senate bill. I have the report in my hand. The purpose of the bill is this: The act of August, 1882, provided for the reduction of the number of engineers in the United States Navy to 170. That reduction was to take place gradually, one vacancy being filled for every two that occurred. The reduction has been going on in that gradual way down to the present, and at the time fixed upon by this bill for terminating the process the number had been reduced to 191, a number not sufficient for the present demands of the service. Now this bill proposes to arrest the reduction at that point. That is all it proposes, and I hope the gentleman will not make any objection to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MCALEER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 378) terminating the reduction in the Engineer Corps of the Navy, respectfully report:

This bill asks simply that the number of officers now in the Engineer Corps of the Navy be retained, without any further reduction by the operation of an act of Congress dated August 5, 1882, and in view of the fact that the numbers of that corps are now far below what is required for efficiency, it is earnestly recommended that the bill be passed at once.

The honorable the Secretary of the Navy says in his annual report for 1890 that "At present there are not enough engineer officers in the Navy for ordinary working purposes, and if no additional ships were building an enlargement of the corps would be necessary," which statement is emphasized again in the Secretary's report for 1891. Legislation is now pending providing for an increase of the Engineer Corps in accordance with the above-quoted recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, but to prevent the corps being reduced below its present membership in the mean time, this bill is submitted for the action of Congress.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to state further to the House that the subject of the proposed increase mentioned in the report is before the committee and under consideration. The Secretary of the Navy most earnestly recommends an increase beyond the number at present existing, but the committee have not seen their way clear to report a bill providing for a further increase. They have, however, taking the most conservative view of the subject, unanimously agreed to report this bill to stop the reduction at the point where it was on the 30th day of last June, leaving the number of engineers in the Navy at 191, all told.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the act of 1882 was passed I believe the expectation was to reduce the number still lower than that.

Mr. HERBERT. The expectation was to reduce it to 170.

Mr. HOLMAN. How was that mistake made?

Mr. HERBERT. Since 1882 several new ships, 39 in all, have been provided for. None of those ships had been authorized or laid down when the act of 1882 was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. But certain other ships have gone out of commission and some have been sold.

Mr. HERBERT. That is true, but more than 170 engineers are required now. There is immediate present need for them to carry on the work of the Navy.

Mr. HOLMAN. But you now have 190.

Mr. HERBERT. One hundred and ninety-one is the number at the time when this bill proposes to arrest the reduction. We wish to arrest it at that point. I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Naval Affairs have not yet reported the bill proposing an increase, and I think it improbable that they will report it. Certainly it will not be reported in the form in which it was introduced, providing for an increase to 320. The Committee on Naval Affairs have taken a very conservative view of this whole subject; they have reduced expenditures wherever it was possible. They have not increased the personnel of the Navy anywhere, and this bill simply proposes to arrest the decrease in the personnel at the point indicated, leaving the number of engineers 191, and everybody who has considered the subject at all understands that the Navy certainly requires that number.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me ask the gentleman whether under the operation of the existing law the number can not be increased as the Secretary of the Navy may demand?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can it not go up to the 300?

Mr. HERBERT. It can not go beyond 191. The act of 1882 provided for the reduction of the number by the process which I have endeavored to explain, namely, by making one appointment for every two vacancies.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That applies to the reduction; but I am talking about the possible increase.

Mr. HERBERT. This bill simply provides that the reduction shall stop at the point where it had reached on the 30th day of June last, namely, 191, and that the number shall remain there.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does this bill provide that the number shall be limited to 191?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir; the bill fixes a limit in the terms I have stated; and that limit is 191. I hope there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. I object. I think we ought to have time to look into this matter. I think this is virtually an increase of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask that the bill remain upon the Speaker's table, so that gentlemen who object may be able to look into it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be retained on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection.

J. C. RUDD.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4464) for the benefit of J. C. Rudd.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay James C. Rudd the sum of $3,500, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, being the amount due said Rudd for the rent of a post-office building in the city of Owensboro, Ky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I think there ought to be some explanation of the measure. If the report gives a full explanation, it ought to be read.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. STONE of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The facts of this claim are fully set forth in a report made by this committee to the House in the Fifty-first Congress, which is appended as a part of this report.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 1352, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4089) for the relief of J. C. Rudd, report as follows:

The proof in this case shows that J. C. Rudd, of Owensboro, Ky., was the owner of a building at said town which was used and occupied by the postmaster at Owensboro from 1861 to 1875 for the distribution of United States mail. At the time of the occupation of said property by the postmaster at Owensboro there was no definite agreement between him and said Moore, the postmaster, as to the amount of rent to be paid by the Government for the use of said property, but it was agreed that the Government would pay him a reasonable price for the occupation of said property.

Your committee are satisfied that the property was used and occupied as charged for, and that the rental value was $3,500 for the time it was used, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. KILGORE. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether this claim has ever been presented before; and if not, why?

Mr. ELLIS. The claim has not heretofore been acted on by the House, but it has been before the Committee on War Claims repeatedly, and each time the committee has reported it to the House favorably. I will say to the gentleman that I personally know this is a just claim. The party for whose relief the bill is presented is a citizen of my town.

Mr. KILGORE. Why was he never paid by the Department, if the Department contracted to pay him?

Mr. ELLIS. As is stated in the report, this building was used for a post-office during and after the war, there was no definite agreement with the Government as to the amount of rent to be paid, but it was agreed that a reasonable price should be allowed for the occupation of the property. Although the claim has been presented to the Department, payment has not been made. I know personally that this claimant has never been paid a dollar for the use of his property. I hope this explanation will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Why has not this man been paid heretofore?

Mr. ELLIS. Simply because the Government has not paid him; that is all; it ought to have been paid years ago, but no appropriation has ever been made for the purpose.

Mr. BOWERS. I presume this man has remained unpaid for the same reason that a postmaster down in my country has not been paid, although there was an official authorization that he should incur the expense. I am going to put in some bills in such cases myself.

Mr. BURROWS. Is this a claim for the use of a building by the Government for a post-office?

Mr. ELLIS. It is.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TELEPHONE LINE ON VIRGINIA COAST.

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7737) to authorize the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Virginia from Cape Charles to Assateague Island, in aid of the preservation of life and property.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to establish a telephone line upon the coast of Virginia from Cape Charles to Assateague Island, providing telephonic communication between the life-saving stations upon said coast and connecting said line from some convenient point with a locality where telegraphic communication may be had with the principal seaports of the Atlantic coast.

Sec. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $16,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a subject belonging to the light-house system proper, and is one of those appropriations not subject to any point of order. This general subject has been considered somewhat by the Committee on Appropriations; and I think that all these items covering a given subject of Congressional action should, as far as possible, be grouped together.

Mr. WISE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not object. I will state to him that since the 26th of August last there have been on the coast referred to seventeen marine disasters, and during the months of January and February five steamships went upon that coast. This measure is asked for by the boards of trade of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not questioning anything of that kind, because we are all informed on that subject; but my trouble about the matter is that appropriations of this sort are scattered in such a manner that unless we keep our time constantly employed in ascertaining the state of the appropriations we are always in the dark. These items ought to be grouped together. The subject of light-houses belongs properly in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. WISE. This is not for a light-house.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as my only question is as to the manner of making this appropriation, I shall not object.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WISE. I move to amend the bill by inserting in lieu of $16,000 in the second section, $15,500, which is the amount reported in the corresponding Senate bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WISE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill

(H. R. 7818) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

It also announced that the Senate had passed without amendments the bill (H. R. 8001) to authorize a national bank at Chicago, Ill., to establish a branch office upon the grounds of the World's Columbian Exposition.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that Mr. GRAY has been appointed one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States in place of Mr. BUTLER, excused.

COLVILLE RESERVATION, WASHINGTON.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7557) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation, in the State of Washington, with certain modifications, and to make appropriation to carry into effect the same.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear something in explanation of this matter. It seems to be too big a thing to go through with a rush in the manner proposed here.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I think that bill is too important to be called up and considered by unanimous consent, and passed, as it would have to be passed at this time, without sufficient consideration, and I am compelled to object.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. If the gentleman from Texas will withhold his objection for a single moment—

Mr. KILGORE. No; I do not think the objection can be removed.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Let me make a statement, and afterwards, if the gentleman sees cause to object, then he will have some ground on which to base the objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I am compelled to object now.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then, Mr. Speaker, let me say that it will cost the Government more money to get the boomers off this land, unless prompt action is taken, than it will cost if the bill is passed to carry out its provisions. I am in receipt of telegrams that there have been two thousand people and over, who have gone in on these lands and have occupied them, and it will take the Army to get them off unless prompt action is taken. We have reduced the bill—

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I am recognizing the importance of the bill, and that is the reason I object to its present consideration.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Why not then go on and consider it, and let its importance be demonstrated; and then the House, with a full knowledge of the bill, can act upon it?

Mr. KILGORE. But it is too important a bill to be considered in this manner.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then give permission to call it up and consider it at some fixed time.

Mr. KILGORE. You can have my permission to consider it any day.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Well, this is a very good time to consider it. Let us go on now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I submit a report from the Committee on Printing, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing have considered the House concurrent resolution to print 6,000 extra copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of precious metals in the United States for the calendar year 1891, and direct me to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The estimated cost of the same is $1,414.50.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed, of the report of the Director of the Mint, on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the calendar year 1891, 6,000 extra copies, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the Senate, 2,000 for the House, and 3,000 copies for the Director of the Mint.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

INVESTIGATION OF THE CENSUS OFFICE.

Mr. WILLCOX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a report from the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census, and ask for its immediate consideration. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to investigate and report on the charges contained in said resolution; and said committee is authorized to appoint a subcommittee, consisting of five of its members, to investigate and inquire into said charges and to visit such cities and places as it may deem advisable to prosecute such investigation; and it is empowered to take testimony, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths, as prescribed in such cases, and to perform such other duties as will enable it to carry out the intention of said resolution. That the expenses of the committee and of said subcommittee be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; and the chairman of the committee or of the subcommittee is authorized to draw from the same on the Clerk of the House in sums not to exceed $500 at any one time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that resolution will be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is a resolution reported by the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census, which was authorized by resolution of the House to make an examination of the Census Office, and the committee recommend that a subcommittee be authorized to investigate the charges embodied in the original resolution.

Mr. WILLCOX. That is correct. The committee now makes this report, asking power to order a subcommittee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution was reported without action by the House?

The SPEAKER. The committee was directed to make the examination and now recommend that the work be done by a subcommittee. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OATES. I would like to hear some explanation as to what is proposed to be done or the necessity for the action that this resolution contemplates.

Mr. WILLCOX. Mr. Speaker, the original resolution referred this investigation to the Committee on the Eleventh Census. The committee have unanimously reported this resolution for the appointment of a subcommittee to pursue this investigation.

Mr. OATES. What investigation?

Mr. WILLCOX. The investigation of the Census Office. The only object of this resolution is to authorize the appointment of a subcommittee to make the investigation instead of the whole committee, which I understand is usual in such cases.

Mr. OATES. Does that resolution propose that the subcommittee shall travel around through the country?

Mr. WILLCOX. Not unless it is found necessary to do so.

Mr. OATES. Wherein is it necessary to go away from this city?

Mr. WILLCOX. The committee do not know that it will be necessary. If it is not necessary, the committee will not go away from this city to make the investigation. There has been some claim that there should be a committee sent to the city of New York to investigate there, and if this resolution is adopted in its present form it will save bringing the matter before the House at another time.

Mr. OATES. Is it in contemplation to go to New York to investigate the alleged errors in the census there?

Mr. WILLCOX. I do not know that that is seriously thought of at this time. The suggestion has been made to the committee that it might be necessary to do that, and if it should become necessary it would be better that this subcommittee should do it than to have the full committee go to New York. It would save expense.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Unless this resolution is amended in such a way as to omit the provision for traveling around by the subcommittee I shall feel obliged to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. That provision is in the original resolution, and I supposed the original resolution covered the whole ground. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] knows very well that the very matters proposed to be inquired into were inquired into during the last Congress.

Mr. WILLCOX. I will state to the gentleman that the objection—

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not understand that this committee at this time reports that there is a necessity for the committee to travel abroad though the country. If it should appear at some future time that it had become necessary then I should not object.

Mr. WILLCOX. I do not know that it will be necessary. The committee will not go to New York unless it is deemed necessary and economical to do so. If a large number of witnesses from the city of New York should be called, it would be more economical for the subcommittee to go to the city of New York than to summon a large number of witnesses to come to Washington.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is mistaken in supposing that the original resolution gives this power.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask that the resolution be read. We have not heard the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire that the resolution be again reported?

Mr. MCCREARY. Yes.

The resolution reported by the committee was again read.

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if most of that power was not granted in the original resolution?

Mr. WILLCOX. Yes, most of it was.

Mr. MCCREARY. Then why is it necessary to confer the power again?

Mr. WILLCOX. This resolution provides for a subcommittee to take the place of the Committee on the Census to make this investigation.

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask for the reading of the original resolution adopted by the House, in order that we may understand what change is proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been charged through the columns of the public journals of the country and through other channels that the Census Bureau has been wrongfully conducted under Superintendent Porter, in the State of New York and elsewhere, in the interest of partisan politics, and not with the view of obtaining correct enumeration and other data, and that the funds appropriated therefor were wantonly wasted, and that said Bureau has been grossly mismanaged: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives:

First. That the Committee on the Eleventh Census be instructed to investigate and report on said charges.

Second. That said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, as prescribed in such cases, and to perform such other duties as will enable them more thoroughly to carry out the intentions of this resolution.

Mr. OATES. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut was that resolution adopted by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will explain to the gentleman. The House has ordered the investigation. The resolution which has just been read was adopted by the House some weeks ago. Now the committee come in with another resolution asking additional power, and that is the resolution which is under consideration.

Mr. WILLCOX. It is unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish to make the suggestion that a committee having certain powers may delegate its powers to a subcommittee without any further action on the part of the House. The only additional feature of this resolution now reported is, that it provides that the subcommittee shall travel about the country, and that the expenses of doing so shall be paid out of the contingent fund.

Now, this committee has not proceeded with its investigation far enough, according to the report made; at least no showing has been made here to the House to-day that will warrant us in concluding that any necessity exists for an investigation outside of the city of Washington. Whenever that necessity is shown to the House, that the committee has proceeded with its investigation as far as it may under its present powers, and that it has reached a point at which the necessity arises to send a subcommittee to some other locality, I shall make no objection, but for the present I do object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLAND. It seems to me that if the gentleman would strike out that part of the resolution which enables the subcommittee to go to other cities there might be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. WILLCOX. I was going to say this, that I am willing to strike out that part of the resolution which empowers the subcommittee to go to other cities if the gentleman objects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will please give his attention. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WILLCOX] says that he is willing that that portion of the resolution empowering the subcommittee to visit other cities may be stricken out.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SIMPSON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to submit a request from the Committee on the District of Columbia, that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the joint resolution (H. Res. 118) to suspend the issue of permits to erect dwelling houses in alleys in the District of Columbia, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Unless this is a privileged motion it can not be entertained.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask the gentleman from Kansas to yield for this.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish the gentleman from Kansas to give his attention, and I ask that he confine his objection to the report, which is withdrawn, and allow some requests for unanimous request. For instance, I shall have to ask unanimous consent to go on with the diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. I withdraw my demand for the regular order, and object to the resolution.

DWELLING HOUSES IN ALLEYS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then, I desire to submit the request to nonconcur in the Senate amendments to joint resolution (H. Res. 118) to suspend the issue of permits to build dwelling houses in alleys in the District of Columbia, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. This is a joint resolution with Senate amendments. The Senate has asked a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] asks unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FELLOWS, Mr. HEARD, and Mr. COGSWELL.

LINEAL PROMOTION IN THE ARMY, ETC.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to a House bill, and agree to a committee of conference.

The title was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 328) to establish lineal promotion throughout the several lines of artillery, cavalry, and infantry of the Army.

The SPEAKER. That is a House bill with Senate amendments, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] asks unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and asks for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. OWENS. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; and, further, that committees having reports to make may file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Before submitting the request the Chair will submit a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARWICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. 1415) for the relief of John Nickles; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHITING, for this day, on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE SESSION.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Banking and Currency obtained leave to sit during sessions of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; and also, that gentlemen having reports to make may be permitted to file them with the Clerk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. OATES in the chair.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill

(H. R. 7624) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I desire the Chair to state if I am correct in stating that on yesterday the committee determined that all general debate should be closed after two hours, at which time the bill would be taken for consideration by paragraphs. I wish to do that so gentlemen may understand we will be brought to a great many votes on the bill this day.

The CHAIRMAN. The House on yesterday agreed that two hours of general debate would be allowed to-day and no more. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, when this debate was opened on yesterday by my friend Mr. BLOUNT, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, had a stranger entered the Hall he would have supposed that he was an opponent of the measure which he himself had presented and the report which he had made. In the beginning of his speech he undertook—

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Chairman, can we not have order in the House? Even as near as we are we can not hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has requested gentlemen to abstain from conversation, and it is hoped that it will be unnecessary to repeat it. Gentlemen desiring to converse will please retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I hope that gentlemen, at all events, in the immediate vicinity of the speaker will not engage in conversations which will make it impossible to be heard even by the chairman of the committee.

I was proceeding to say that my distinguished friend, when he opened his speech, spoke as if he were opposed to the very measure which he had himself introduced and upon which he had made the report, coming from the committee of which he is chairman.

It struck me as a singular proceeding for the chairman of the committee, but in order that I may not misinterpret the gentleman I will read from his speech of yesterday the paragraphs to which I now refer. He says:

European countries may require able diplomats. Not so with us. We have no occasion for the toys of courts. The best talent of the land is found devoted to internal prosperity.

I can only say in reply to that, Mr. Chairman, that if there had not been diplomats of very great distinction in former times whose capacity added largely to the area of our country and whose intelligence and ability enable them to settle satisfactorily grave questions with reference to the acquisition of territory and of terminal bounds, there probably would not now be a Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, over which my distinguished friend from Georgia now presides with such marked ability.

I can not sympathize with him, therefore, in his declaration that we have no necessity for diplomats. Following the convictions of his judgment, as he went on further in his speech and declared his sentiments upon this subject and stated in what way he would abolish most of our missions abroad, he still more strongly indicated his opposition to the system itself. Now, I can not sympathize with my friend in that view of the question, for the reason that in my opinion this country has been greatly advantaged by the men who have managed its diplomatic affairs.

While our armies have acquired territory, as in the Mexican war and other wars, which have added vastly to the area of our country, I yet think that the diplomacy displayed by the great leaders in that department in the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana, and, in 1823, in the acquisition of Florida, is evidence that there are as many laurel wreaths crowning the brows of peace and of the statesmanship of the land as there are gathered around the helmets of the soldier and the brows of the leader of the soldier.

I am rather astonished that my distinguished friend from Georgia did not follow out, as he usually does, with a good deal of heroic bravery, the convictions of his own mind and propose an absolute abolition of our diplomatic system. My friend said further in the course of his speech, that we had no use for a minister at Greece. He said:

We are told that Greece is classic ground. But, sir, the muses have long since deserted her mountains. Her beautiful marble no longer awakes the genius of her once gifted sculptors. Her legends are fast passing away from the earth, because the intellectual and moral progress of the age does not stop long or spend much time over the strength of Hercules or the beauty of Apollo, the heroism of Achilles, the wanderings and genius of Ulysses, the beauties of Helen, or the wantonness of Paris. Her halls of philosophy are closed forever. Her seacoast, once the center of an immense commerce, is almost as silent as at the dawn of creation itself. In that land is an ignorant, thriftless, idle population, standing beside the ruined tombs and monuments of a decayed and forever departed greatness.

Then, speaking of Switzerland, my friend says:

Providence has taken mountain and water and created there the most bewitching scenery that is exhibited in any portion of the world, and yet, sir, where is there to be found her consideration in the political or commercial relations of the world? See has no standing whatever.

That from an American statesman in regard to Switzerland! But first, Mr. Chairman, in relation to my friend's remark about Greece, that she has existed in vain, and that she has no commerce. Sir, she sits upon the Mediterranean of the Old World, as our great ports of New Orleans and Mobile and Galveston sit upon the Mediterranean of America—the Gulf of Mexico. Greece acquired her power, her commerce, and much of her learning from another race that settled upon the shores of the Mediterranean.

The hardy little race of Phoenicians transferred from the East to the West the centers of civilization, and settled on the shores of the Mediterranean. They were the earliest of nations who went out on the seas on commercial expeditions.

It was from these hardy seamen that Greece derived the lessons that made her great in science, literature and art; and Rome derived from Greece the lessons which made her the mistress of the world. The history of the Old World teaches us that the Mediterranean enriched every nation that has controlled its commerce. Sir, I do not think my friend from Georgia was fortunate in his selection of these two particular nations, Greece and Switzerland, to illustrate his opposition to our diplomatic system.

Greece may not now have the active commerce that she once had within her borders, but the world still listens to her great orators and poets, and admires the daring of her generals, and catches the inspiration of her great painters and sculptors, and models after her unrivaled architecture. It was in her school of art that Titian was taught those wonderful tints and colorings that ages have not defaced, and Michael Angelo was taught to chisel those forms of strength and beauty from the cold and insensate marble which stand to-day the models for the world.

Specimens of her architecture cover the world. The splendid specimen in our own Treasury building will be as much in vogue two hundred years from now as it is to-day. The lessons she has given us, the spirit in which she lived are not lost. Her commerce may have declined, but she has left imperishable monuments of her genius and her power that have stood the test of time and will stand it for all coming generations. And Switzerland, the gentleman says, has nothing but mountains and water.

It is something, I would say to my distinguished friend from Georgia, to have mountains and water. They are the great elements of the landscape of the world; and while it has not been my fortune to look upon the towering mountains of Switzerland pointing their snow-capped summits to the skies or to listen to her gurgling streams as they roll to the ocean, I have stood upon territory like Switzerland in our own land—in the grand and great old Commonwealth of Virginia; I have looked at her lofty mountains standing upon the grassy plains that lie at their base, sometimes glassed in sunshine, and sometimes covered with shadow, and sometimes the home of the storm god; and I have ceased to wonder that a country with such scenery should have bred heroes among her men and heroines among her women. And so of Switzerland, the first great Republic of the Old World, whose cantons were more devoted to liberty than any nation on the globe save our own, and who bred men loving liberty, like the celebrated William Tell, and who have bequeathed to us lessons of wisdom upon republican simplicity which we might do well in many respects to imitate.

But my friend says we have no use for diplomats. Ah! have we not? If we have not, then he ought to put the pruning knife closer down to the root of the tree and cut up the whole wrongful establishment. Have we not any need for diplomats now? Sir, we have felt the demand for diplomacy on two occasions since this Congress met in December last. We had been in session but a little while when the news came that some sailors from one of the great war vessels of this country had been rudely assailed upon a foreign soil and more than one of them killed. Appeals were made to the Department of State and to the Executive to demand reparation for this great outrage upon American sailors. It is true that the aggressor was a small country—small in area, feeble in power as a military and as a naval nation; but these outrages had been perpetrated, and it was important that we should demand reparation. Another instance arose since we came here with reference to that territory for which we paid $7,000,000, the Territory of Alaska, and which was valueless—

Mr. ALLEN. If the gentleman will allow me one question, will he please explain to us how our minister helped us very much in the Chilean affair.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes, I am going to do that. I was saying that in addition to this Chilean trouble there was another trouble that has grown up since we assembled here, and that was with reference to the restoration of the modus vivendi on the Bering Sea that prevailed last year. That was another question which was settled by diplomacy. It was understood that Lord Salisbury would never consent to the restoration of the modus vivendi. It was said that no persuasions could be submitted to him which would induce him to do it; and we were threatened with a disturbance because Canadian vessels, forty in number, had already sailed from Canadian ports for the purpose of depredating on the seals in that region, which was valuable to us alone on account of the seals, and were engaged in what is called pelagic sealing, which is the shooting of the female seals in the open ocean while they are bearing their young to the places where they are to be born.

It was important, therefore, that we should settle this matter. At first it was supposed a settlement was impossible; but I want to say with reference to the Chilean trouble, about which my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] has made inquiry, and with reference to the Bering Sea trouble, that fortunately for the country—and I do not hesitate to say it because the gentleman of whom I am about to speak is a Republican—fortunately for the country we had in the position of Secretary of State a man of such large diplomatic ability that both with reference to the Chilean matter and with reference to the Bering Sea controversy diplomacy settled the whole trouble. Treaties were made which settled those questions forever, compelling Chile to salute the flag which she had insulted and to make reparation for the sailors whom she had murdered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. To what extent did our minister in Chile or our minister at the English court participate in the settlement of the complications to which the gentleman has referred? As a matter of fact, have not all our treaties of any importance within recent years been brought about by negotiation between the chief of our Cabinet here and the representatives of the countries with which we were negotiating?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. To a certain extent, yes. I have just said so. I have paid to Mr. Blaine the compliment of saying so.

Mr. HOLMAN. But has any gentleman as foreign minister of this country rendered in our own time really valuable service in these matters? Have not the complications which have arisen been settled by conference or negotiations between the Secretary of State at Washington and the ministers here representing foreign countries?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The Secretary of State acts all the time upon communications which are made to him by our ministers abroad.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are simply his clerks.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. That may be so; but they accomplish the purpose; and they are agencies which we ought to have—agencies which no nation can dispense with.

All of our foreign ministers stand there amenable to the direction of the Secretary of State and the Executive of the country, because the Department of State is clothed with the power of holding through them our sole intercourse with foreign nations. And therefore I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that it was diplomacy that settled the Chilean question, as well as the Bering Sea matter. A great deal has been said about Mr. Egan, our minister to Chile, and he has been made the subject of a good deal of adverse newspaper criticism in some latitudes; but I must confess I have not heard of, or seen, anything that he did in connection with this matter that was not proper and right. He seems to have taken all of the steps that were necessary; he did his duty, and reported to the State Department what was going on. He made reports to the Government and communicated to the Department officially the situation as it appeared to him upon the ground, and the result of the matter has been, as you know, that the Chilean Government has made ample reparation to our Government for the wrong done and the insult offered our flag.

In this case, as well as in the Bering Sea case, our ministers were instrumental in accomplishing the end desired. The Secretary of State can not communicate directly with either England or Chile, except through our ministers abroad, and Mr. Blaine himself has shown great statesmanship in the matter and in the treatment of the questions which have arisen, even since this present Congress has assembled, and I am free to say so, even though he be a Republican. I hold, Mr. Chairman, to the doctrine that when a man reaches that state of prominence in this country, when he sits by the side of the President as his counselor and chief adviser, that he represents no political party and no faction of a political party, but that he represents the welfare, the interests, and the prosperity of the whole country. He does not represent a party in any sense of the word. The Secretary of State, whether it be a Bayard under the Administration of Mr. Harrison, represents the United States in its entirety and all of its people.

Our distinguished Secretary of State under the late Democratic Administration would scorn the idea that in the intercourse through him with foreign nations he was the representative of any party, or that he represented any particular section of the country. And so, I believe, with reference to the present Secretary of State; and as I have already said, Mr. Chairman, in his intercourse with foreign nations he must have the assistance of our ministers abroad.

But, sir, I might read further extracts from the eloquent speech of my distinguished friend from Georgia to show his position upon this subject, but I will come now to the consideration of this bill and the report submitted by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and discuss the only matters of difference that exist in the committee on the subject.

All who listened to the address of my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] on yesterday, to my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], and to Mr. POST, who also addressed the committee on this subject, have been apprised of the fact that there was unity in the majority of the committee except on two points, one being the appropriation for continuing the survey of the transcontinental-longitudinal railway through Central and South America, for which an appropriation of $65,000 was provided, and another, the appropriation of $25,000 for continuing the work of the Bureau of Information of the International Union of American Republics. The appropriation in this case was $10,000 less than we formerly made, and I will remark here in passing that the reductions by the committee in the foreign missions and the cost of the consulates abroad show a saving of about $72,000, as contradistinguished from the bill of last year, and much greater than that as shown by the estimates of the State Department for this service, amounting, I think, to over half a million dollars. But these are the only two points on which there is a difference in the majority of the committee as the bill is reported.

How do we happen to be in a condition to make this appropriation, and why is there necessity for making it at all? I will say to you that we do it in accordance with the law, the statute law, which stands upon our statute books. It is not a new appropriation. It is an appropriation made by the committee in conformity with law passed by the Congress of the United States, a law which I will have published in my remarks.

But first I wish to call your attention to what occurred in the House when that law was passed. It will be found on page 1661 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fiftieth Congress, first session, and is as follows:

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference for the purpose of promoting arbitration and encouraging reciprocal commercial relations between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central, and South America, and the Empire of Brazil—

Which has since become a republic—which was read, together with the amendments of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCCREARY. I move the previous question on the amendments, and on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

That is what occurred in the House of Representatives when you created this Pan-American Congress. My honorable friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the accomplished chairman of the present Committee on Foreign Affairs, was a member of that House. He gave his assent to this bill. The honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was a member of that House, and gave his assent to this bill. I think it carried with it when it was passed, for the purpose of executing its provisions an appropriation of $75,000. They both voted for it; they both sustained it; not a word in opposition from either in any way or form.

Mr. BLOUNT. How does the gentleman know how I voted? There was no ye-a-and-nay vote.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. There was no ye-a-and-nay vote, but my friend could have had a ye-a-and-nay vote if he had wanted it.

Mr. BLOUNT. How does the gentleman know that I was even on the floor? There is nothing in the RECORD to show it.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. No, there is not; but it seems to have attracted sufficient attention to have passed while both of these gentlemen were members of Congress, and could have opposed it. If there was so much opposition to this Pan-American Congress, then was the time to have indicated it. Then was the time to have opposed it; and I now propose to call the attention of the House to the bill itself, in order to show that a bill of that magnitude and that importance and for the purposes which it proposed, could scarcely have passed this House, or even been read, without attracting the vigilant attention of my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who is never asleep, who is always awake and always vigilant, or of my equally vigilant friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who was a member at that time. I will include in my speech, with the permission of the House, the text of this bill. It is found in the United States Statutes at Large, Fiftieth Congress, 1887-'89, volume 25, page 155, as follows:

An act authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested and authorized to invite the several Governments of the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil to join the United States in a conference to be held at Washington, in the United States, at such time as he may deem proper, in the year 1889, for the purpose of discussing and recommending for adoption to their respective Governments some plan of arbitration for the settlement of disagreements and disputes that may hereafter arise between them, and for considering questions relating to the improvement of business intercourse and means of direct communication between said countries, and to encourage such reciprocal commercial relations as will be beneficial to all, and secure more extensive markets for the products of each of said countries.

SEC. 2. That in forwarding the invitations to the said Governments the President of the United States shall set forth that the conference is called to consider—

First. Measures that shall tend to preserve the peace and promote the prosperity of the several American States.

Second. Measures toward the formation of an American customs union, under which the trade of the American nations with each other shall, so far as possible and profitable, be promoted.

Third. The establishment of regular and frequent communication between the ports of the several American States and the ports of each other.

Fourth. The establishment of a uniform system of customs regulations in each of the independent American States to govern the mode of importation and exportation of merchandise and port dues and charges, a uniform method of determining the classification and valuation of such merchandise in the ports of each country, and a uniform system of invoices, and the subject of the sanitation of ships and quarantine.

Fifth. The adoption of a uniform system of weights and measures, and laws to protect the patent rights, copyrights, and trade-marks of citizens of either country in the other, and for the extradition of criminals.

Sixth. The adoption of a common silver coin, to be issued by each Government, the same to be legal-tender in all commercial transactions between the citizens of all of the American States.

Seventh. An agreement upon and recommendation for adoption to their respective Governments of a definite plan of arbitration of all questions, disputes, and differences that may now or hereafter exist between them, to the end that all difficulties and disputes between such nations may be peaceably settled and wars prevented.

Eighth. And to consider such other subjects relating to the welfare of the several States represented as may be presented by any of said States which are hereby invited to participate in said conference.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be disbursed under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State, for expenses incidental to the conference.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, ten delegates to said conference, who shall serve without compensation other than their actual necessary expenses, and the several other States participating in said conference shall be represented by as many delegates as each may elect: Provided, however, That in the disposition of questions to come before said conference no State shall be entitled to more than one vote.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State shall appoint such clerks and other assistants as shall be necessary, at a compensation to be determined by him, and provide for the daily publication by the Public Printer, in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages, of so much of the proceedings of the conference as it shall determine, and upon the conclusion of said conference shall transmit a report of the same to the Congress of the United States, together with a statement of the disbursements of the appropriation herein provided for.

Approved May 24, 1888.

The reason why my two distinguished friends [Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BLOUNT] did not oppose the bill which brought the Pan-American Congress into existence may be found in the fact that both of the political parties of the country stood committed to it. Here they are:

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL PLATFORM OF 1884.

The Republican party favors a policy which shall keep us from entangling alliances with foreign nations, and which shall give the right to expect that foreign nations shall refrain from meddling in American affairs, the policy which seeks peace and trade with all powers, but especially with those of the western hemisphere.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL PLATFORM OF 1884.

We favor an American continental policy based upon more intimate commercial and political relations with the fifteen sister republics of North, Central, and South America, but entangling alliances with none.

Then was the time to have opposed this measure. If there was no necessity for a conference, for closer commercial relations between the United States and the Central and South American republics, for which both political parties declared, if there was no necessity for any of these things, then was the time to have made the opposition to the bill, and not now, when that Congress has been held, when its results have been achieved, and as an incident to and connected with the purposes and objects of that Congress of American states, held at the city of Washington in the year 1889, it was proposed that they should survey the route of what is called the longitudinal railroad, running through Mexico, Central, and South America.

Now, it is said by my distinguished friend, the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT], that he is going to move to strike out this portion of the bill that appropriates the $65,000. I say that the time to have opposed it was when we passed the law asking these countries to send their representatives here to meet with us to confer with us upon the subject-matters which were presented to them. They did come—

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has read the act authorizing the Pan-American Congress. He says that the time to have made the issue which I am making in relation to this survey was when that bill passed the House. I ask him if his mind will go further and say that the time to make the issue about this Government undertaking to guarantee the neutrality of this railroad, to guarantee the concessionaires their land grant subsidies, and all their rights, if he does not think that was the time to have fought all that?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I will answer the gentleman's question. I want first to show what he said on this subject yesterday. He incorporated a table, which also appeared in his report, and he further says:

I want to stop this hidden, mysterious thing at the outset. I want to abolish this Bureau. The information circulated can be gathered from encyclopedias and from other cheap sources. It is a place for somebody to occupy. It is one of the numerous bureau "sores" to be found in every Department of the Government. It is active; it appeals to the House by having communications sent to members of Congress of its consequence. It struggles for its life. So with this survey I would strike it out from the bill.

In answer to the question of my friend I would suggest to him that the proper way to have stopped all this was to have voted against the bill calling the Pan-American Congress, and that he should have then called the attention of the House to the fact that there was no necessity for this intercourse between the South American countries and ourselves.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not responsive to my question.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I think it is. It is in the good old-fashioned Yankee style, answering one question by asking another.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman thinks it is an answer, I am willing to let it stand.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Very well; I am quoting your own speech just as you made it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I made that speech, but I have asked you a question which I do not think you have answered.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. But the balance of the House do not know as much about it as you do, because they have not studied it.

Mr. BLOUNT. If they will take occasion to read the RECORD I will leave it to them.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. In giving the table which the gentleman quoted in his remarks my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] seemed to think there was a discrepancy between what was said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] and the table, and he seemed to raise the point that nothing at all has been contributed by these other Republics, or very little for this purpose.

Now, the table as printed in the gentleman's speech shows that Chile had paid for the Intercontinental Railroad survey three thousand and odd dollars, and the other republics had paid some. In the one which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] read, of which I presume I have a copy, is a letter from the Secretary of State, showing the countries that have appropriated for the establishment of this Bureau; and I believe the last one of them has made its contribution.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Not to the intercontinental survey. Some of them have not paid their share; but as I understand from the letter of the Secretary of State they have paid their contributions to this Bureau.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit a question?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY. Is it not true that the House of Representatives has twice appropriated $65,000 in appropriation bills for the preliminary survey of an intercontinental railway; and is it not true that no objection was made by any member of this House to the appropriations I have referred to?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I have never heard an objection.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. If it was wrong then and wrong now, is it ever too late to correct a wrong?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman in this connection if it is not true that neither report accompanying the bills which contained this appropriation had any particle of reference by which the attention of the House was called to the subject?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the fact.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. That is the act; and it was passed by the House, and passed by the Senate, and therefore members were apprised of it; the invitations were sent to the South American Republics, and the result was the Pan-American Conference.

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill contained the paragraph appropriating $65,000 for this preliminary survey, as the part of the United States, and it appeared twice in the bill. It was read to this House, and it required no discussion in the report on the bill, because of the reading of the bill to this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I suppose all who happened to be here when the bill was read are responsible for the demonetization of silver?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Every member of the House who was here in Congress at that time had an opportunity to hear it, and he had an opportunity to oppose it if he chose, and certainly had an opportunity to be heard in opposition. I take it as a solemn act of the Government, as it was passed by the House and by the Senate, signed by the President, and put upon the statute book, and we held this convention in 1891. Now, they proposed a survey for this transcontinental railway, which it is now said is objectionable, because in making the survey the Government is said to be committed to the construction of the road.

Well, now, on the contrary every provision is made against it by the construction of that agreement, for by the eighth article it is provided that the concessionaires, the men to whom the concessions are made by the South American Republics, shall be at the whole expense of the construction, outfit, and running of these roads. What is the fact? Why, some years ago when the attention of the country was called to these Three Americas Railway, as it was called, and when that bill was before the House I had occasion to make a speech, and I want to give some tables which I used in the progress of that speech for the purpose of showing the importance of this connection, this closer connection with these people of the South American Republics. How do we now communicate with these Central and South American countries directly south of us? Whether we want to write a letter or order a bill of goods from these countries, it must first go to London and thence to the particular country we desire to communicate with. No direct communication with the countries south of us except through foreign ports and in foreign bottoms.

Now the natural entrepôt for all of that trade is New Orleans, Mobile, and Galveston. There are ports lying nearer to her, and yet we control nothing of the great trade of Central and South America. We wanted, therefore, to have a conference with these Republics in order to secure closer relations of amity, friendship, concord, and commerce. That was the object.

England and Germany controls all of that trade, and France, and even Italy have a considerable portion of it. I am told by gentlemen who have been in Central and South American ports, that in those countries it is a rare sight ever to see a vessel flying the flag of the Union at her masthead. That the ships of other countries take the great products of those countries to Europe, and if we need them and get them, they have to be procured from Europe. If you want to send a letter, it goes by the way of London before it can reach any of these South American countries.

Now, the vast commerce and trade, and vast production of our own country ought to find easy access to South America. In the table which I had the honor to submit to the House in a speech I made on the subject in 1888, which I will read again, I quoted it for the purpose of showing the great importance of the great valley that lies between the Allegheny Mountains on the one side and the Rocky Mountains on the other, and the great production of that country, and of our manufactures, that we desire to be carried to South America and to have her products brought back to us. I give it as an illustration of the very wonderful productions of our own country, and the fact that we ought to have in these other countries a ready market. In that speech I said:

The tables of the last census show that the States and Territories drained by the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries contain 51 per cent of the nation's area and 58 per cent of its production, and that these same States and Territories produced in 1880—the census year—98 per cent of the sugar, 91 per cent of the coal, 80 per cent of the corn, 81 per cent of the pig iron, 76 per cent of the oats, 74 per cent of the wheat, 68 per cent of the cotton, 68 per cent of the tobacco, 60 per cent of the hay, 57 per cent of the forest products, 55 per cent of the wool, and contained 92 per cent of the swine, 97 per cent of the mules, 74 per cent of the horses, and 73 per cent of the cattle in that same census year.

The total grain products of these same States drained by the Mississippi River and her navigable tributaries amounted in this same census year to: Of Indian corn, 1,558,358,686 bushels; of wheat, 342,230,515 bushels; oats, 310,271,700 bushels; of barley, 18,888,089 bushels; of rye, 13,974,324 bushels; of buckwheat, 5,082,880 bushels; making a total aggregate of 2,218,779,373 bushels; making an average of 44 bushels per capita for every man, woman, and child enumerated in the census of 1880. Well may the compiler of these tables have exclaimed when he finished his compilation, "Behold! here is the granary of the world!"

In addition, to the mileage of navigable waters of the Mississippi and her tributaries must be added 2,000 more miles of navigable tributaries flowing from Texas, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi into the Gulf of Mexico.

To these great natural highways of trade and commerce must be added the artificial highways, consisting of the great chain of railways which, like a network, embrace the continent and find their southern terminus on the waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

To give an idea of the vast commerce which finds its distribution through the Gulf of Mexico, it must be remembered that the seven great cotton-producing States of Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Tennessee, and Florida supply us annually over four million of bales of the cotton crop, made and shipped.

From the six States of Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas we had a supply of timber, amounting, according to a table of estimates compiled from the last census, to a grand total of 184,281,500,000 feet. The wealth of the Gulf Coast States in timber alone, apart from their agriculture, is almost beyond calculation.

Of the great cornfields of the United States, estimated to cover 195,000 square miles, 157,000 square miles—or 80 per cent of the whole corn area—lie in the States and Territories drained by the waters that flow into the Gulf of Mexico.

The great iron deposits of Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Ohio, and Alabama constitute another source of illimitable supply and inestimable value to the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico.

But I turn from the contemplation of the vast, exhaustless, and unbounded resources which flow by God-given channels and the artificial channels devised by the genius of man through our own favored country into the Gulf of Mexico, to the consideration of the commerce of the countries which lie immediately south of us and border like ourselves on the shore of this "American Mediterranean," the Gulf of Mexico. The nations bordering on the Mediterranean of the Old World sometimes spread their power and colonized under the red battle flag of the god of war. The nations bordering on the Mediterranean of the New World—the Gulf of Mexico—must send out as conquerors the white-winged messengers of commerce, bearing the olive branch of peace.

The generous and magnanimous interest shown by our sister Republic of Mexico in the world's exposition at New Orleans has already accomplished much in the way of establishing closer commercial relations between the United States and Mexico. It is a remarkable fact that while our nearer neighborhood to our sister Republic of Mexico, lying next to us on the Gulf, has made us somewhat familiar with her products, resources, capacities, and wants, our people are almost strangers to the trade and commerce of Central and South America; indeed, it may be said to be almost an unknown country to the vast majority of the sturdy, energetic, and progressive people of North America.

It is estimated that in the last fifty years more than ten millions of immigrants have landed on the shores of North America. They have spread over our vast and fertile fields and into our manufactories and workshops, and added to the products of labor to such an enormous extent that we may be said to be the producers of the food and clothing and manufactures and machinery of the world; and one of the greatest problems, upon the successful solution of which depends our national prosperity, is that of the movement and distribution of the surplus products of our labor. In looking for markets for the surplus product of our nation's labor our eyes naturally turn to the countries which border on our great internal sea, the Gulf of Mexico; and yet when we examine the statistics of the commerce of our immediate neighbors whose ports lie at our very doors, we find the field occupied by British, French, and German vessels; and travelers in Central and South America tell us it is rare to find the flag of the Stars and Stripes floating at the masthead of any maritime vessel on the Atlantic or Pacific shores of South America.

Maj. Frederick Hilders (to whom I am largely indebted for information on South American trade) in his learned essay advocating the construction of the "Three Americas Railway," quoting from an English paper, speaking of the trade of Central and South America, and how and where it goes, says:

"A great revival in the trade of Mexico and Central and South America is confidently anticipated. British merchants and manufacturers will do well to make the most of the opportunity before their French, Belgian, and German rivals shall have taken the lead in the supply of those markets."

America and American merchants and manufacturers are not even mentioned as a possible competitor for this vast trade, which lies at our very doors, easily approached over the most splendid sheet of water that dots the globe.

On the continent south of the United States are fifteen Spanish-American republics, the Portuguese-American Empire of Brazil, and the four European colonies.

They have a total population of 40,000,000 consumers, an area of about 8,000,000 square miles, or more than double that of the United States.

In climate, resources, products, supply, and demand they are the reverse and complement of the United States. Commercial exchanges with such countries are, therefore, in accordance with sound laws of trade and political economy.

They are exceedingly deficient in manufactures.

They need our railway iron and supplies, farming implements, cotton and woolen goods, boots and shoes, sewing machines, telegraph and telephone supplies, clocks and watches, notions, and a thousand and one products of our invention and skill.

We need their coffee and sugar, tropical fruits, hard woods, fiber plants, and other raw materials.

In brief, these countries represent twenty American Indias, whose unsupplied and inviting trade fields we will find most profitable to occupy with our surplus energy, skill, products, and manufactures. At present, however, our share of that trade is disgracefully small. Their foreign commerce, exports and imports of merchandise combined, is in value as follows:

The Republic of Mexico.....	$55,000,000
The five Central American republics.....	24,428,000
The nine South American republics.....	348,646,000
The four European colonies.....	31,980,000
The Empire of Brazil.....	215,001,000

Total..... 675,055,000

Of this total trade the United States controls but $126,822,000, or less than one-fifth part, the lion's share being monopolized by Great Britain, France, and other European powers.

Of the total annual imports of these twenty countries, which amount to $303,812,000 in value, we supply but one-seventh part.

But the facts are still more disgraceful when we confine the statistics to the fifteen sister republics.

Their total annual foreign commerce, exports and imports combined, is as follows:

The Republic of Mexico.....	$55,000,000
The five Central American republics.....	24,428,000
The nine South American republics.....	348,646,000

Total fifteen republics..... 428,074,000

Of this total trade we control but $63,636,000, or less than one-sixth part.

This great trade is within our grasp if we by intelligent action through this conference seize it. The great ports of the Gulf of Mexico are the entrepôts, marked out by nature, into which should flow and from which should go the trade and traffic of our own immediate Southern neighbors on the Gulf. Shall we sit supinely by, as we have done in the past, and see this vast empire of commerce snatched from our hand by nations separated by thousands of miles of ocean from them. The laws of supply and demand and the necessity of opening channels of commerce between nations is the same to-day as when Adam Smith in his Treatise on the Wealth of Nations, more than a century ago, said:

"According to the natural course of things, the greater part of the capital of any growing country is first directed to agriculture, afterward to manufactures, and last of all to foreign commerce."

And again:

"When the products of any particular branch of industry exceeds what the demands of the country require, the surplus must be sent abroad and exchanged for something for which there is a demand at home. Without such exportation a part of the productive labor of the country must cease and the value of the annual product diminish."

Every market must be availed of; and that which is ours by the natural laws of trade must not longer be yielded to foreign nations, if we would prevent the calamity of having an overplus of production for which we can find no market, and which, without a market, ceases to be worth producing.

Maj. Hilders, in his admirable treatise, speaking of the importance of this trade with South America, says:

"The geographical position of the United States and the currents of the ocean which flow from the mouth of the Amazon to our shores will insure to American merchants the greater portion of that immense commerce, the magnitude of which can scarcely be estimated, when all that vast region of the interior of South America shall take the important place in the commercial brotherhood of the world for which nature has so bountifully prepared them."

Mr. Nimmo, the former Chief of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, in a pamphlet published some years since, entitled The Proposed Inter-oceanic Canal in its Commercial Aspects, tell us—

"That we have but 24 vessels in the Chilean trade, against 372 going between Chilean and European ports. Not one of our 24 is a steam-going vessel, while among the others, those under European flags, are many and magnificent ocean steamers."

What is here said of Chile is true of every Spanish-American port.

This vast region of South America is a country teeming with fertility, rich in tropical products, needing only that the genius and spirit of the sturdy Anglo-Saxon of North America shall be brought to bear upon its vast resources in order to make that country, barren as a desert, blossom like the rose. It is for this reason that we desire conference with these people, that we may be brought into commercial relation with them, that we may improve the national position we hold towards them.

The genius of our distinguished countryman, the late James B. Eads, proposed by his ship railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, which would be practically to extend the mouth of the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, and thus realize the dream of Sir Walter Raleigh expressed to his royal mistress, Queen Elizabeth, more than three hundred years ago, "that the genius that could solve this problem will have opened the gateway to the commerce of the world."

Mr. Chairman, attention was called to the importance of the construction of this railway and to the survey as a preliminary, by Maj. Hilders, from whom I quoted on a former occasion, in a treatise which he published some years ago showing the necessity of the continuation of our railway system from the United States through Central and South America. And let me here direct the attention of gentlemen to the fact that not an acre of our land is to be covered by this proposed railroad.

On the contrary, we have completed our railway not only to the borders of Mexico but through that country to the Mexican capital and far beyond it. And in many other of the South American countries railways have been completed which would form a part of this great longitudinal railway system. The idea was to connect our railway system with railways extending through those marvelous countries lying on either side of the Andes.

The table of trade with these countries lying south shows a grand total of $700,000,000.

Now, of all this total of nearly $700,000,000 of trade shown by this table the United States controls but $126,000,000, or less than one-fifth. Was it not well enough, therefore, that we should have had this Pan-American Congress with a view to opening up commercial relations with those countries not merely by water, not merely by sea, but by rail, because railways have already become the great means of transportation not only for passengers but for freight also? Of the total imports of these countries, which amount to several hundred millions in value, we supply but one-seventh. I will print the table showing the facts.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed forty-three minutes.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I can not, therefore, stop to quote further from these tables, but I will print them in the RECORD for the purpose of showing what the trade of those countries is with us and our trade with them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word as to the feasibility of this trans-continental railroad. We have had our engineers on that route and they have made a survey and have reported that it is feasible. They have reported that the three Americas can be linked together by bands of iron, establishing direct communication with the remotest portions of Central and South America. We have contributed an insufficient amount for the purpose of making the preliminary survey to ascertain the practicability of the construction. Somebody has said here that some individual or some corporation will get the benefit of this preliminary work.

Well, sir, we build all railroads by aggregations of capital. In some of the South and Central American countries the government builds them, but most generally railroads have been built by aggregations of capital, and those aggregations are called corporations. Gentlemen say a corporation ought not to be allowed to build this road. Why, sir, corporations have built all the roads that run through your own country, yet now, when we are asked to make a little contribution of $65,000 to continue this preliminary survey, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs says that Mr. Carnegie, or Mr. Jay Gould, or some other millionaire, might get hold of the road and build it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care who builds it so that it is built, and by the very term of the pan-American conference it is provided that the men who construct it are to bear the whole expense of the construction. This is simply a proposition that this Government and the other governments concerned shall contribute in proportion to their respective populations for the expenses of making the preliminary survey. Not a dollar is to be contributed by us to the construction of the road. Not a mile of the road is to be built upon our soil. We are not asked to concede any land. We are not asked to be responsible for any bonds. It would be a strange thing indeed if any sane man should propose that we should give bonds for the construction of a railroad outside of the territory of the United States. And yet the argument here is that if we vote this small appropriation to help to carry on the preliminary survey we thereby pledge ourselves to give bonds to construct a railroad through Central and South American territory.

What an absurdity! The attempt was made to give this enterprise a black eye by saying—and this is a favorite topic with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]—the attempt, I say, was made to give this enterprise a black eye by saying that we have granted so much land in the past for the construction of the latitudinal railroads from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Northern Pacific Road, the Southern Pacific Road, the Central Pacific Road.

What did you give? You gave the great American arid desert. It had nothing on it when you gave it but the broom sage of the prairie, and the buffalo and the elk. That is what you gave. Probably you gave too much and too abundantly; but that is what you gave. How has it been returned to you?

Great States have been founded; empires have been carved out of it. The genius and skill of the farmer have poured water upon the arid desert until it has blossomed like the rose. State after State has been erected from the lands in this arid desert which you gave to these railroads; and they have lifted their magnificent columns to support the grand entablature of the Union, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. [Applause.] You have not, therefore, disposed of this land except by measures looking to the benefit of the citizens of the whole country.

Now, we propose simply to subscribe a small amount of money on the part of the United States to make this preliminary survey along the side of the Andes and all the way down through Central and South America. This road will be of inestimable value in developing our own commerce and trade, and will bring to us the trade of this vast region of country which as yet sleeps in the arms of nature, untouched by the genius of man. Wake it up by the whistle of the locomotive; let the throb of progress be felt in Central and South America as it has been felt in our own country; you will see that land of the tropics blossoming like the rose and pouring into the coffers of this country an untold amount of wealth. It is a region of country that nature has done much for; it needs but the energy, the skill, the muscle, the bone, the blood, and the brain of man to make it one of the grandest regions in the world.

Will you allow yourselves to be deterred from engaging in an enterprise like this by the pitiful suggestion that if you appropriate $65,000 for carrying on this preliminary survey you will be committing the Government to land subsidies (as my friend from Indiana says, echoed by the gentleman from Georgia), and to the issue of bonds which will constitute a tax upon the people of the country. Such an idea has never occurred to any man who is urging this enterprise. I say, therefore, that this matter ought to be appropriated for; we should provide in this bill $25,000 for the dissemination of this knowledge.

I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of State showing that so far as concerns the amount to be appropriated for the support of this South American Bureau in Washington—not in those foreign countries—every one of the South American and Central American republics but one has contributed its quota according to population. I publish that letter in connection with my speech, and also another addressed to me and covering a communication addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, D. C., April 19, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to state for your information that Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Venezuela, Haiti, Peru, and the Argentine Republic have paid their assessments for the maintenance of the Bureau of American Republics. Haiti has also paid for one year in advance. The Department is advised that the assessments of Ecuador, Bolivia, Uruguay, and Brazil have been forwarded, but the drafts have not yet been received. It is also advised that provision has been made for the payment of the assessments of Colombia and Paraguay. The President of Santo Domingo, in his message submitted to the Congress of that Republic on the 5th of March last, recommends an appropriation to pay its share in the support of the Bureau, leaving Chile as the only one of the American republics to be heard from.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant.

WILLIAM F. WHARTON,
Assistant Secretary.

HON. CHARLES E. HOOKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

BUREAU OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, U. S. A., April 20, 1892.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose you herewith a copy of a letter which was sent to-day by the Secretary of State to the Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Very respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM E. CURTIS.

To the Hon. CHARLES E. HOOKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1892.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you that since my last communication on this subject the Government of Peru has paid its assessment for the support of the Bureau of the American Republics, and the Congress of that Republic has made appropriation for the additional payment for one year in advance.

The Congress of Santo Domingo has ratified the recommendation of the International American Conference for the establishment of the Bureau, and has appropriated money for the payment of its share of the expense.

I am, sir, sincerely yours,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

HON. JAMES H. BLOUNT,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

One word further, before my time expires. It is important that we should establish close relations between ourselves and these South American countries; that we should control their trade and should give them ours. All these republics of South America have adopted in spirit and temper, if not in totidem verbis, our Constitution, of which the great commoner of England, Mr. Gladstone, the octogenarian of the British Parliament, living as he does under a limited form of monarchy, said: "The American Constitution is so far as I can see the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." This Constitution, thus eulogized by this former British premier, now a member of the English Parliament—in his ripe old age, in the fullness of his mental vigor, thank God—has been adopted by each of these republics in spirit and in temper.

I say, Mr. Chairman, we ought not to hesitate about a small appropriation for the grand purpose. Think of it! You can take a train at New York City and by railroad lines now constructed reach the city of Mexico; and if the enterprise now under consideration is feasible, as the engineers say it is, you will be able to traverse by rail Mexico, Central America, and South America. Thus these great countries will be brought into immediate contact with our own population. You will thus open up to the talent, the energy, the skill, the science of the American laborer, the American inventor, and the American manufacturer a market, not across the water, but a market from which he can never be debarred by hostile custom-houses erected for the purpose of taking toll.

It would open a new and unfettered market for the surplus products of the West and the South. What this country suffers now, what it suffers from in my region of country more than it has suffered from 1846 to the present time, is the selling of its great production on which it is so largely dependent at 3¢ and 4 cents a pound. And do you recollect that my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] went into ecstasies yesterday in the discursive argument which he made on the Chinese question and which I will take some other occasion to answer? He talked about the laborers of this country and the petitions he had received from them.

We have in our country millions and millions of laborers. It is true their skins are black; but they are the great body of the laborers of the cotton region of the South. To-day the poorest laborer is on the American continent. The whites of that once favored region are greatly depressed and anxiously looking to this Congress for some sort of relief in the shape of reduced taxation. They will have to follow the plow handle through the heat of the summer sun, illy clad, sometimes probably hungry, in order to do what they can to make a sustenance for themselves and for their families. If there is any class of people on God's earth who need the protection of the American Government, it is this class of people whom the American Government is responsible for placing in their present condition.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, every tax should be removed from the necessities of life and every obstacle in the way of their advancement taken away. Take the tax off of the plow, which turns the mold, off of the trace chain that draws the plow, off of the clothing which the laborer must wear, off of the shoes, if he is able to purchase shoes, and sometimes many of them in their poverty do not have the means to buy shoes at all. But take the tax off all these necessities of life throughout the whole list, and you thereby give some relief to the terrible condition now existing in every one of the Southern States.

Mr. Chairman, do not stop there. Do more than that; go a step beyond and do that for which your constituents sent you here. Give to the country a bimetal circulation of gold and silver, as you promised. We take from the mines of this country every year something over $100,000,000, one-third of which is gold and the balance silver. Give the people the benefit of this product. Give them the dollar of the fathers. Coin the silver dollar as you coin the gold dollar. For I tell you if you do not; if you do not keep your promises to the people in this regard, when you go back home and your people say that you belonged to a House that had 146 Democratic majority and yet you could not pass a silver-coinage bill; that you did not dare to attack the McKinley bill in its entirety, but only introduced sporadic bills affecting four or five of the schedules here and there throughout the bill; that you did not sweep from the statute books the McKinley administrative bill and put the tariff where it ought to be put, on the luxuries of life and not on the necessities of life, I tell you that you will have a difficult explanation to make to them.

Do your duty and then when you return to your constituents you will receive the plaudits of the people—"Well done, good and faithful servant!" But if this Congress adjourns without yielding something of the relief which the country demands, and which I have in part indicated, it will be a disappointment to the masses of the people, now writhing under a load of debt that they are unable to bear, with mortgaged homes, accumulations of debts of all kinds and no means to relieve them; with merchants loaded down with the crops of last year, unable to dispose of them and unable as well as unwilling to make further advances of clothing and provisions on the coming crop.

That is the condition of the country in all its parts almost without exception to-day. This Congress was sent here to relieve the prevailing distress. It was sent here to attack the McKinley bill in its entirety and the McKinley administrative bill. If you had done your duty faithfully and sent that bill to the other end of the Capitol, if they did not do their duty it was their fault and you were acquitted. And if they had done theirs and such bills had gone to the Executive and he chose to veto them, the responsibility was on him and his advisers. But these two things this Congress was elected to perform, and the man or men, I care not what their position, who stand in the way of the accomplishment of these two great objects, so essentially necessary not only for the development of the country but for the welfare of all our people, will be pointed out as men who have failed to meet the just and reasonable expectations of the people who sent them here.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all. It has been said that even the coinage of silver, that ancient metal which figured in the first great transactions of the world, the earliest money known to civilization, that figures in the Bible itself, for we are told that the field bought by Abraham in which to bury Sarah, his wife, was paid for with 500 shekels of silver, has not been provided for our people as we promised; a money which in 1873 was demonetized without consideration, or, as stated by that grand old Roman, Mr. Thurman, in his terse words, "You passed the Revised Statutes without even cutting the tape strings that bind and tie them together."

Silver was demonetized then by surreptitiously leaving off the coinage act, and you have failed ever since to remonetize it.

You failed in 1876. My distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] in 1878 introduced a silver bill, and in 1890 another which gives us four and one-half million ounces. But nothing else has been done. There has been a steady failure to rehabilitate this money metal of the world which dates back to the earliest ages; which was used in Egypt and Syria and in all countries, both in ancient and modern history, all of which give illustrations that it is one of the grand old money metals. Why should we hesitate to reissue again the dollar of our fathers, with the capacity to buy as much as any gold dollar or as much as any greenback dollar?

You have $346,000,000 of greenbacks in circulation. You have $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of their redemption, and upon your annual output of metal, as well said by that distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who spoke the other day, and whose magic intellect cuts to the kernel every subject that he touches, and adorns it, and illustrates it, and makes it intelligent to the most simple, he said, "You make $100,000,000 annually out of your mines, one-third of which is gold and two-thirds silver, and upon that you can safely base an issue of $300,000,000, and have all your paper money based upon a sound metallic basis.

Mr. HITT. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH].

[Mr. FITCH withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for the opportunity to be heard upon this question, which I regard as a very important one. If I had supposed that the way would have been opened I should have carefully prepared a statement which, I believe, would have had a better effect in preventing unwise legislation than I can hope from the few hasty observations which I shall now make.

The greater part of the legislation of Congress is in relation to matters of our own country, respecting which we are all well advised.

The interests involved in home legislation are large and receive our careful consideration, but when we come to consider matters which affect our relations with foreign countries we do not find that same degree of intelligence—in fact, we find an amount of ignorance and lack of information that is appalling.

Even the average business man who is accustomed to confining his operations to this country with its immense home market, forgets that outside of the United States there are large markets teeming with industry and enterprise that will well repay his attention, markets with which, if he will, he may have close affiliations advantageous to himself and to the commerce of this country.

I shall confine my remarks, on account of the shortness of my time, to the Spanish-American markets. They more readily appeal to us because they are our near neighbors, and because on account of that proximity should be our customers for whatever they want that we are able to supply.

Self-interest, as well as the obligations of brotherhood in the family of republics, demand that we shall cultivate intimate relations with them.

More than a generation ago we announced through one of our great statesmen that we would not tolerate European interference with these countries, and have since steadily maintained that doctrine. It seems to me that having assumed that position, we also assumed with it certain responsibilities, having by our announcement cut them off from European enterprise we ourselves in a great measure became responsible for their development.

I ask to-day what have we as a Government done to develop them? What have we done to cultivate close and intimate relations beneficial to both? If American commerce and enterprise have gained a foothold in those countries, it has been done without the assistance of our Government, without such assistance as Great Britain has afforded her merchants and producers.

The wise policy of that country in its commercial arrangements has, notwithstanding our proximity and notwithstanding the fact that we can supply them on advantageous terms with what they need, and with what we want to sell, kept them in commercial bonds which we find it hard to break.

In nothing has England been wiser than in the way in which she has managed her diplomatic and consular service; it has been a tower of strength to her merchants and manufacturers, and in broad contrast with our own system, or rather lack of system. Her policy has been permanent, persistent, and constantly growing in efficiency, ours has been without system, changeable, and inefficient, and by the measure offered to-day we propose to further cripple it and to drive from the service the few good men who have served us.

It is my aim in the few remarks that I make this afternoon to induce this Government to inaugurate a better policy in relation to its consular service, with some permanent features which shall secure to it a chance to increase in efficiency.

What is Great Britain's system? I invite your attention to the English definition of what is meant by a consul:

An officer appointed by competent authority to reside in foreign countries, in the view of facilitating and extending the commerce carried on between the subjects of the country which appoints him, and those of the country or place in which he is to reside.

Then here is the Englishman's ideas of the duties of a consul:

The duties of a consul, even in the confined sense in which they are commonly understood, are important and multifarious. It is his business to be always on the spot to watch over the commercial interests of the subjects of the state whose servant he is; to be ready to assist them with advice on all doubtful occasions; to see that the conditions in commercial treaties are properly observed; that those he is appointed to protect are subjected to no unnecessary or unjustifiable demands in conducting their business; to represent their grievances to the authorities at the place where they reside, or to the ambassador, etc., or to the government at home; in a word, to exert himself to render the condition of the subjects of the country employing him, within the limits of his consularship, as comfortable and their transactions as advantageous and secure as possible.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman from what he is reading?

Mr. COOMBS. I am reading the English definition of the duties of a consul.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman does not hold that it is the definition under our Constitution?

Mr. COOMBS. No, sir. I am going to contrast the English consular system with ours.

Now, what are the qualifications of a consul, according to the English idea?

A consul, in order to be properly qualified for his employment, should take care to make himself master of the language used by the court and the magistracy of the country where he resides, so as to converse with ease upon subjects relating to his duties. If the common people of the port use another, he must acquire that also that he may be able to settle little difficulties without troubling the magistracy of the place for the interposition of their authority, etc.

He is to make himself acquainted, if he is not already, with the laws of nations and treaties, with the tariff or specification of duties on articles imported or exported, and with all the municipal ordinances and laws.

He is to protect from insult or injury the subjects of his Government.

He is to advise his countrymen in relation to their business or other affairs.

He is to relieve distressed mariners.

The British act says:

He will bear in mind that it is his principal duty to protect and promote the lawful trade and trading interests of Great Britain by every fair and proper means, taking care to conform to the laws and regulations in question, and whilst he is supporting the lawful trade of Great Britain he will take special notice of all prohibitions with respect to the export or import of specified articles, etc.

The following are culled from:

He should never, if possible, engage in trade for the reason that: First. He becomes a competitor of his countrymen and less likely to give proper information to those who wish to extend their commerce to his port and thus become his competitors.

Second. Because his engaging in trade closes to him valuable avenues of information.

He should represent the citizenship of his country in a dignified way.

Those are the qualifications which Great Britain insists upon in her consuls. Men are carefully selected by her for that service. They are not selected because they are friends of Lord B or Lord C, or because they are on the right side of politics. They are selected because they can represent Great Britain in the markets of the world to which they are sent. They are sent there for a specific purpose. It seems to me sometimes that our consuls are selected not merely that they have been politically useful, but sometimes for the purpose of sending them into exile.

Mr. HITT. I yield fifteen minutes additional to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COOMBS. I shall not want to occupy all that time.

You see how it is and why it is, that in all these outports in Spanish America, in South America, in the Portuguese countries, and Spanish countries, Great Britain has been able every time to get ahead of us in the establishment of her trade. The English consul is a man in whose hands British subjects can safely place their interests. There are few American consuls in whose hands we would dare to place our interests. Our consuls are not men of high enough grade; and the bill before us proposes still further to reduce that grade. They are not as a rule men who possess any of the qualifications which Great Britain demands from her representatives.

Great Britain never employs a foreign merchant to act as consul if she can get one of her own citizens for the service. It is only in a case of great emergency that she employs a man of another nationality as her consul. She wants somebody to represent Great Britain, to attend to the interests of the British merchants and the British people.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], in discussing this subject yesterday, took the broad view that this country has an overproduction which it is necessary for us to market abroad. Every year this is becoming more important, not only to our agricultural interests but to our manufacturing interests as well.

We must have a market abroad for our surplus products, or we must stop producing; and the cultivation of this Spanish-American trade is a very feasible way to provide the market abroad. We must have Government agents that represent the American spirit of enterprise and of manhood. And we must not deal with these countries in a niggardly spirit. If we degrade a consul in a Spanish country, that country regards it as an insult to itself. The Spanish people are very high-spirited and sensitive; and no matter though it be for their interest to trade with us, if we disregard these traits we lose their trade and their friendship. The Spanish character is peculiar; and we must act in accordance with its peculiarities if we wish to obtain their friendship and their cooperation in securing their markets.

Therefore I look with disapproval on the policy of reducing the rank of our consuls. We should rather make an effort to raise the grade of our men employed in such capacity, and instead of bringing the service down we should try to raise it to the level of the few good men we now have in the service.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish also to speak, and shall pass hurriedly over the ground, in relation to the provision that is made in the pending bill to appropriate $65,000 for the purpose of paying our proportion of the preliminary survey of the International Railway. I think we may better call that an explorative survey rather than a preliminary survey. I can not speak from personal knowledge of how thorough the action of the engineers has been in this regard, and what I shall say now on this subject will be simply on the general principle involved.

I think it is a great and an important thing to have this explorative survey made to indicate to private enterprise the natural resources of the various countries and where railroads may be profitably built. By so doing we hasten the development of countries in whose prosperity we have a great interest. None of us expect that merchandise will ever be brought from the lower part of Chile up over that vast line of railway to New York, but we do know that it opens up regions of country which otherwise would not be opened up, and brings the people of those regions into communication with us. These lines will undoubtedly be tapped in many cases by lines running to the seaboard, and trade will come that way. But we shall have accomplished the purpose in view—we shall have opened up these countries to our commerce.

The trade of these countries naturally belongs to the farmers, manufacturers, and merchants of the United States, and we are going to get it if the Government will help us. It can well afford to do it in view of the great and general interests involved. The prize is well worth the effort to secure. I disapprove most seriously of the clause, appended to the bill making this appropriation, that it shall only be paid after the South American republics have paid their proportion. Why, they have agreed to pay theirs, and they are men of honor; and dare you on the floor of this House impugn the honor of one of these Spanish governments? If you do you might just as well close up your relations with them here and now. They will resent the insult, and rightfully.

Why should they pay any part before we pay ours? Why can not we trust them in this matter, as well as expect them to trust us? I hope, therefore, that provision will be stricken from the bill. I also urge that if the appropriation is to be made at all for the publications of the Bureau of the American Republics, and they have done much to excite interest in foreign trade, that it should be made without any such provision as that, because we can not afford to make it. I tell you, gentlemen, I know the Spanish character, and I know that if you embody that feature in the bill you offend every one of these governments, and we do not want and can not afford to offend them.

It is our policy to treat them in a manly, honorable way, to show our confidence in them, not to be patronizing. They will not stand patronage. They will stand brotherhood, but not patronage. Treat them as equals, and they will take their lessons from us. Show a lack of confidence and respect for them, attempt to dominate them and you incite resentment and rebellion. But treat them as brother Republics, worthy of our respect and consideration, and they will prove themselves worthy of that respect.

I would like to have dwelt more on the subject of our consuls, because there is much in it of importance to this country. An American consul—a consul of any nation—should never be a merchant. He never can act in the interests of the general public when acting in his own interest. Besides that, the sources of information are closed to him as a merchant which would be open to him as a representative of this Republic.

It is not a dignified position for the representative of the American Republic to be a retail merchant selling groceries. He should represent the American Republic; he should represent the dignity of the Republic; he should represent the dignity and the magnitude of our commerce; and, sir, I hope the time will come when the American Government will be aroused to the necessity and to the importance of providing, that we shall not only be represented in foreign parts as well as Great Britain is represented, but better. We deserve the best. While we must insist upon economy, we do not want it at the expense of efficiency, if so, it ceases to be economy.

Mr. HITT. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, one feature of this debate is certainly very gratifying to me, that of all of the distinguished men, especially on the other side, who have spoken on the bill none have sustained the chairman of the committee in his proposition to reduce the appropriation of $65,000 to carry out our agreement with the South American republics, or argued in favor of the other proposition to consolidate the missions of Colombia with Ecuador, Peru with Bolivia, and Denmark with Sweden and Norway.

It was with a feeling of pride as a fellow-citizen and as a colleague on this floor that I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] on yesterday and of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to-day, words of patriotism, words of broad and liberal statesmanship, and it is to be hoped that the majority of this House will follow these great leaders of their party. In the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on yesterday there was, however, a remark reflecting upon a country with which we have always sustained friendly relations, and coming from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that speech, read as it will be in every capital of the world, if allowed to go without an answer, could bring no good will to the citizens or the Government of our country; and I was very glad to hear the gentleman from Mississippi answer so ably that part of the speech, so far as time allowed him, by calling our attention to the present architectural and literary wealth of the world that has accrued from the past glory and the literary and artistic fame of Greece.

But I hope the patience of the committee will allow the indulgence of a few additional observations in the same direction for the purpose of showing that the present condition of Greece would not justify such a remark from such a source. The passage referred to is as follows, speaking of Greece:

Her halls of philosophy are closed forever. Her seacoast, once the center of an immense commerce, is almost as silent as at the dawn of creation itself. In that land is an ignorant, thriftless, idle population, standing beside the ruined tombs and monuments of a decayed and forever departed greatness. What need have we for a minister at that court, I repeat?

Now, those reflections are either just or unjust; they are either necessary or unnecessary. I will not take the time of the committee to discuss whether or not on an occasion like this it was necessary to make a reflection of that sort, but I will say a few words as to whether those reflections are just or not. We must bear in mind that while, so far as area, population, and wealth are concerned, Greece is a very small country, yet it has not only a past of fame and glory but it has a recent history and a present position among the nations of the earth to be proud of. It only emerged from the oppression of Turkey in the year 1830, after a desolating war and revolution that lasted, counting from the first outbreak to the establishment of anything like a settled government, ten years, an era which completely wiped out its old-fashioned schools and most of its wealth and brought the degradation that great civil wars usually bring with them. What is her position to-day? She has now a free public school system throughout the entire country equal to our own. It is not only free as to tuition, but it is compulsory as to attendance.

Every child is required by law to attend school between the years of 5 and 12; and as to her higher institutions of learning, she has a university established in the year 1837, not a fourth as old as the oldest colleges in the State of Georgia, and yet that university has 98 teachers, 2,402 students, and an endowment superior to any college or university in the State of Georgia. They have gymnasia, answering to our colleges in this country, 33 in number with 221 professors and 3,670 students. Of "Hellenic" schools, answering to our high schools, they have 297, with 501 teachers and 1,622 scholars. Of common schools they have 1,741, and in them 1,920 teachers and 102,000 scholars; and of parochial and private schools they have 627, with 32,704 scholars.

Their illiteracy is about the same as the illiteracy in the State of Georgia, about 23 per cent. They have more graduates of colleges in proportion to population than any State in this Union, not excepting even the State of Massachusetts. On this subject

I wish to send to the Clerk's desk and have read a paragraph from Mr. Sergeant's work on New Greece, relating to this matter of college education and college graduates in Greece.

The Clerk read as follows:

A visitor to Athens, or to any other of the populous towns on the mainland or in the Morea, may, if he chooses, retain the services of half a dozen university men, and be waited upon at every turn by fairly educated gentlemen, holding diplomas in law, theology, or medicine. The fact is one which speaks volumes for the high degree of development attained by national education in Greece; and it can not be regarded as reflecting any positive discredit on the Greeks themselves.

It is quite true that there is a plethora of educated men in Greece, and that a million and a half of inhabitants (1889) do not require, and can not find employment for, all the physicians and lawyers turned out by the University of Athens. The poverty of the country, still more than its paucity of inhabitants, precludes the full utilization of this professional training. The phenomenon is unique in modern history; and some critics have been led to talk of the widespread education of Greece as an "impediment in the way of progress."

And this is the country "whose halls of philosophy are closed forever," according to the gentleman from Georgia. Why, sir, the halls of philosophy and learning in that country were never thrown open on a more magnificent scale than they are to-day, and the youth of no other land to-day throng more eagerly or numerous, according to population, into the "halls of philosophy" than do the youth of Greece.

Now, as to their commerce. The chairman of the committee said yesterday—

Her seacoast, once the center of an immense commerce, is almost as silent as at the dawn of creation itself.

I venture the assertion that Greece never, in its palmyest days, had the commerce that it has to-day. Listen to this. Is this the silence of the dawn of creation?

The merchant navy of Greece in 1890 numbered eighty-one steamers, of 40,484 tons, and five thousand eight hundred and nine sailing vessels.

Nearly six thousand vessels of their own, mind you, besides an immense commerce carried on in foreign bottoms in that little country, with about the same area and population as the State of Georgia. They have only 2,187,298 people in Greece (census of 1889), and 1,837,353 people in the State of Georgia (census of 1890). Have you a commerce of that magnitude to break the solitude of the harbors in the State of Georgia?

Now, as to their interests in affairs of government. Suffrage is freer there, three times freer than it is in the State of Georgia.

In 1881, when the population was considerably less than it is now, there were 460,639 voters in Greece, and of these 306,957 availed themselves of their privileges and deposited their ballots at the general election of that year; while at the last election in Georgia, that elected members to this Congress, only 111,214 voters, out of at least an equal number of voters as there were in 1881 in Greece, availed themselves of the privilege of voting. They have an independent government, monarchical in name, but more like than unlike ours. The constitution adopted there in 1863 is modeled in many respects on our own. They have a king, it is true, but he is a nominal king, and has not near the power that our President has. They have a cabinet of seven ministers.

The ministers are identical in name and in power with our own, with the single exception of the minister of education there having a seat in the cabinet and some ecclesiastical functions instead of being the commissioner of a bureau, as he is with us. It is a fact that Greece not only furnishes educated men for its own country, but it furnishes teachers, lawyers, doctors, professional, literary, and educated men for half of Turkey, and a noble example of patriotism, courage, and devotion to the cause of enlightenment and popular government near the Orient which we, of all nations, should be the last to disparage. In the bill there is a proposition, for instance, to consolidate into one office that of minister to Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. In speaking of Switzerland the chairman said that Switzerland was picturesque, of course, but that in a diplomatic and consular view it was unimportant because in the matter of commerce it had no significance.

Now, then, take the gentleman's test as to the diplomatic importance to us of the people of Switzerland and as to Jerusalem, where he said we send no ships, because ships can not go to Jerusalem. Now, let us take that test, the test of commerce, the test of the movement of ships, and apply it to these Scandinavian countries where it is proposed to consolidate missions heretofore always maintained separate and distinct. Last year 32,578 vessels entered our ports. They belonged to twenty-three different countries and carried twenty-three different flags, the commerce of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway sailing each under its own separate flag. Of these 32,578 vessels 17,979 carried the British flag and 11,046 carried the Stars and Stripes. And next to the Stars and Stripes in number and importance comes the cross of Norway on 1,204 ships, then follows Germany with 788, Italy with 463, Spain with 288, and so on. I will here insert the whole table:

Nationality of vessels in the foreign trade which entered United States ports during the year ending June 30, 1891.

Norway alone sent into our ports last year nearly one-third of the flags that entered, excepting only the stars and stripes of our country and the union jack of England. What conclusions are reached in this instance if we apply the test of commerce relations which the gentleman attached to Switzerland and Jerusalem? There are at all times strong, permanent reasons against the consolidation of these missions, but no time could have been more inopportune than this to undertake the consolidations proposed in this bill.

Not only is our commerce with these countries very large, but so is our immigration therefrom, and both are growing. Over a million of their people have become citizens of our country within the last forty years. Even the one item of collecting the estates of decedents and transmitting them to the lawful owners on one side of the Atlantic or the other, as the case may be, furnishes an enormous volume of business, most of which is transacted through the consular and diplomatic service. Denmark's colonial possessions neighbor with us from Greenland's icy mountains to the West Indies' coral strand. Our whalers and Arctic explorers have more than once been benefited by the hospitality of the Danish Government on the shores of Iceland and Greenland. A reciprocity treaty has not yet been signed with the Danish West Indies. It should be done.

Under existing law we pay no salary for secretary of legation or chargé d'affaires at either Copenhagen or Stockholm.

Under the proposed bill a secretary or chargé would necessarily have to be provided to take charge of the business and archives of one of these offices while the minister was at the other. That added to necessary traveling expenses weakens the economy argument—the only one invoked.

A merchant can compute exactly what he loses by extending credit to unworthy customers, but he never knows what he loses by refusing credit to good customers.

The same principle holds good as applied to the dealings of nations with each other.

We can compute exactly the expense of our diplomatic service. It is very light; the consular service being self-sustaining. Some of these international courtesies may be possibly unprofitably bestowed, but for the present and in the immediate future the good will of the Scandinavian Governments are of unusual value to us. The King of Sweden and Norway has been selected to name one of the judges in the Bering Sea arbitration.

The tonnage question with Norway under the Dingley shipping act is not yet settled, and in view of the position assumed by this Government when Henry Clay was Secretary of State in 1828, and then enforced against Norway, when our positions were exactly the reverse of what they are now, it is difficult to see how we can escape not only refunding to Norway the amount of her claim, as she did to us in 1828, but even of reducing the rates to all nations from six to three cents per ton under a fair construction of the favored nations clause.

The good will of the royal house of Christian IX of Denmark might accrue to the benefit of our diplomats, and 100,000 annual tourists to Europe in many ways. His second son is King of Greece, his oldest daughter is the Princess of Wales, his second daughter is the wife of the Czar of Russia.

To be sure, we who are all sovereigns have no artificial respect for titles, but American chivalry teaches us not to be uncivil to anybody, least of all to persons who are loved, respected, and obeyed by all the people of Scandinavia, Greece, Russia, and England.

We are at this time especially solicitous for the good will and the coöperation of every great civilized power in the world in the matter of the Columbian celebration of next year.

In the speech of the chairman of the committee there was a reference made to a letter from our minister at Denmark, which was sent by the Secretary of State to him, and he said there was great secrecy and great mystery connected with the State Department. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] very well answered him on that point, that the secrecy and mystery would disappear to a great extent if he would simply read the published reports of the State Department; and I might add that the mystery and secrecy would disappear still more if he would simply go and ask questions at the State Department.

Now, I have seen something in the newspapers about this mysterious dispatch of the minister at Denmark, and on yesterday I had the curiosity to know what it was, so I wrote a letter to the State Department, and in two hours afterward, a copy was put on my desk, and I will ask to have it read, in order that the House may know what our minister is doing there in the matter. I will ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Secretary of State and the communication accompanying it.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 25, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of even date herewith, and in compliance with your request take pleasure in inclosing copy of a dispatch from the United States minister at Copenhagen, dated April 1, 1892, relative to the consolidation of that mission with that of Sweden and Norway.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.

HON. M. N. JOHNSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, April 1, 1892.

SIR: On yesterday I telegraphed you as follows:

"BLAINE, Secretary of State, Washington:

"Reports concerning abandoning Danish mission may imperil Denmark's attitude World's Fair. Can this be counteracted?"

"CARR, Minister."

As will be seen by my No. 74 the Folksting had already appropriated 250,000 crowns ($67,000) for Denmark's exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition.

At the time I telegraphed you the measure was being considered in the Landsting, and I was anxious lest the report that this legation was to be abandoned and its duties performed hereafter by that at Stockholm might have reached the honorable members and influence them unfavorably. Fortunately the report, coming through the New York papers, had not yet become generally circulated here and the bill passed the Landsting. It now goes to the Government for consideration, and I hope that the ministry is so thoroughly committed to the measure that it will be approved.

The report of abandoning this legation is, so far as circulated, very distasteful to the Danes and liable to detract from their kindly regard for an interest in us.

Fearing that this report might imperil the final passage and approval of a measure for which I have been constantly working in every way consistent with my position for more than a year I telegraphed you, in the hope that you might devise some means to counteract its influence. I need not assure you that I am doing all in my power to counteract the influence of this report, and that I shall continue to do so until final action is taken. I think that the bill will be approved, but shall feel greatly relieved when it is done.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CLARK E. CARR.

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired. General debate upon this bill has been exhausted.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Salvador, and Honduras, $10,000.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8, page 2, strike out "and Honduras" and insert "and" before "Salvador."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment, with another to follow, would be to take Honduras away from combination with the three republics Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Salvador, and to place it in a mission with the Government of Guatemala beside it, with which it is allied, with which it has been and is friendly. It will remove it from association in our mission with three republics toward which it has been often hostile and with which it has continuously strained relations. The amendment offered would simply continue the law as it exists, and prevent a mischievous innovation which if carried out as it stands in this bill will tend to impair the usefulness of our minister to be sent to the four republics here combined in one mission.

Everyone who has paid attention to our foreign affairs knows that the value of a minister depends largely upon success in making himself acceptable to those who rule the country to which he is accredited. The fact that our minister was popular, effective, and influential at Honduras would, when known by the others, produce exactly the opposite sentiments and situation. Further, in the matter of convenience, the Republic of Honduras on the Atlantic or Gulf Slope is entirely detached from the other three republics on the Pacific Slope, separated by a distance that is considerable, by a journey that is difficult as the mission now exists. The other three lie together on a line west of the mountains, convenient to the other by coast transit, associated in interests and sympathies, and in many respects a political unit. I think the amendment is one which will commend itself to the good sense of the House, as it has commended itself to the House and the Senate in years past and to the Executive, and they made it law.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask my friend what communication there is between Honduras and these other three republics?

Mr. HITT. There is, no doubt, means of passing from the capital of Honduras across the mountains, but it is circuitous and not the usual or great highway of commerce or intercourse. As I have stated, these countries, Honduras and the three small republics on the west, do not have intimate relations, as they are not friendly and do not lie conveniently contiguous. On the other hand, the intercourse of Honduras with Guatemala, which is beside it and with which it is to-day united in our mission, has long existed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the result of this proposed amendment is to increase the item in this bill by the amount of $5,000. The arguments that have been produced by the opponents of this measure are not unexpected to me. I deem it proper at this point to call the attention of the committee to the action of the Forty-fourth Congress. The Committee on Appropriations then having charge of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was honored by having for its chairman the late distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Randall, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as a member of the committee in association with a number of other prominent Democrats and Republicans. That committee recommended the placing of the Central American states in charge of one minister, combining the diplomatic representation at Colombia with Peru and Ecuador, combining the missions of Chile and Bolivia, combining Paraguay, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic, dropping the minister to Greece entirely and putting the consul at Athens at $1,000, abolishing two envoys extraordinary and four ministers resident, and forty-four consuls and officers of less grade, reducing the salaries of the ministers to France, Great Britain, Russia, and Austria $3,500 each, and soon.

I have read enough for the purpose I have in view at this time. Suffice it to say that on that bill they made a reduction of $435,837. There came then the same argumentation that comes today. We were told then as we are told now of the importance, the almost overshadowing importance, of the ministers at all the courts where the committee proposed a reduction. We were told then as we are told now that we were attacking the commerce of the country in reducing the salaries of our consuls far below what they are now, and that in remitting many of them to fees, as is here proposed, we were taking action inimical to the public interest.

All this debate that we are hearing now was gone over then; every suggestion made now was then submitted; and these arguments and suggestions were answered as I trust they will be upon this bill. At that time the policy of "cheese-paring" was denounced. All the terms of contumely that could be heaped upon the action of the committee at that time came from the opposition; but, bravely and resolutely going forward under the leadership of the distinguished Pennsylvanian I have named, the House adopted that report, as it did many others. The Senate made its contest; the debate was gone over in that body. Then conferences were had and disagreements. But out of that conflict there resulted a reduction of $40,000,000.

If gentlemen propose to consider these suggestions from the partisan standpoint of the opposition, as they were not considered at the time to which I have referred, it is well enough; if such obstructions are to be interposed, to let us understand it in the beginning.

The particular proposition pending relates to the change in regard to Honduras, putting it with Guatemala; and by the amendment, if adopted, there is an increase of $5,000 on this item. That is the extent of this proposition, and it is one of many similar items in this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on agreeing to the amendment). The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HITT. I call for a division.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the amendment be reported again.
The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, page 2, strike out "and Honduras" and insert "and" before "Salvador."

Mr. HITT. This will make one mission of the three republics.

Mr. BURROWS. It puts Honduras where it was before?

Mr. BLOUNT. And makes an increase of $5,000.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Colombia and Ecuador, $10,000.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to amend by striking out in the clause just read the words "and Bolivia," and inserting after the word "dollars" the words "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Bolivia and Ecuador, each, $5,000."

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as I understand it, virtually legislates out of office the minister to Ecuador and the minister to Bolivia, because Bolivia is associated with Peru and Ecuador with Colombia, and one minister only is to be sent to Peru and Bolivia and only one to Colombia and Ecuador.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it is unwise as well as unjust to make the changes contained in this bill. It is unwise for the reason that it is not respectful toward these two republics to withdraw our minister or to appoint only one minister to both countries. This discussion has disclosed how sensitive these republics are in regard to matters of this kind, and the action of Denmark has been quoted in illustration of this fact. I wish to call attention to an incident which occurred in Bolivia since the present minister has been representing us in that country. The minister to Bolivia is a friend of mine and one of my constituents, and I am more familiar with the wants of this country than I might otherwise be.

Two Americans were murdered there—men of character, men who were in that country gathering information in reference to the mines and mining of Bolivia and Peru. One was a citizen of Ohio. These men were wantonly and brutally murdered without any excuse whatever.

The minister being on the ground at once called the attention of the Republic to this matter; and an effort was made to arrest the murderers before they had crossed the boundary into another republic. One of them was arrested; all of them were tried, a thing which perhaps could not be done in this country; and three of them were found guilty of the murder. The one who had been arrested was executed. The other men were, according to the latest information, in Peru; and their extradition was demanded. The minister, being there and giving his personal attention to this matter, secured the arrest of this man, and will probably secure the arrest and return of the others and their execution.

Not only that; he was there to settle the estate of these men and hold their property for the benefit of their families, and has been doing this. I have seen a recent letter showing that their assets have been converted into money and the interests of their families taken care of. He is also looking after another matter. According to the laws of that country the property of the murderers can be confiscated and the proceeds paid to the families of the men who were murdered. All these matters are being looked after by Col. Anderson, our minister to Bolivia. If he were not there this could not be done. It could not be done if the matter were to fall within the province of a minister whose residence would be in the city of Peru.

The proposition in the bill to consolidate these missions seems to me unjust to these diplomatic officers. They accepted these appointments and went to those distant countries with their families. Col. Anderson, a constituent of mine, left a good home and a good law practice and went to that country largely for the reason that physicians thought that the climatic influences of the country would be very beneficial to his wife. He is there to-day in the discharge of his duty, which he has performed to the entire satisfaction of the Government and the country. The city of La Paz, the capital of Bolivia, has the greatest altitude of any city in the world, and is supposed to be a locality where certain classes of invalids are greatly benefited. But I object to this consolidation mainly because it is unjust to Bolivia and Ecuador and will result in great disadvantage to our own country in crippling its trade and diminishing its exports.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would result in an increase of $10,000 on the pending bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. How can it result in such an increase as that? The salary of the one is $10,000 and of the other $5,000. Now, you make the whole $10,000. It can not be a saving beyond $6,000; one thousand in one place and a saving of five thousand in the salary, making six thousand in all.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I will not quarrel with the gentleman about figures. He is interested in his friend and I do not blame him. I suppose there are a good many gentlemen on the other side who have friends that may be made uncomfortable by the provisions of this bill. But I think the public service is first to be regarded. We hear many statements about the difficulty of communication between these countries.

In the bill which I have just referred to, in the Forty-fourth Congress, Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador were put together. How came these recommendations to be made? How did the committee come to that conclusion in respect to these nations? There was at that time a gentleman who had visited all the consulates over the world, sent by Gen. Grant for the purpose of investigating and giving information. He was summoned before the committee and gave in detail all of these items, which were thoroughly gone over, the matter of the combinations of missions, the reductions of consuls, and so on. His information in regard to these matters was more comprehensive than that of any gentleman on this floor.

Now, I understand that there may be changes in situations, but not in the geography. There is a proposition of my friend that he will take care of his friend and increase his salary. He claims that there is some inconvenience in reference to it. I can not think that because there is occasionally some slight inconvenience in the matter of extraditing a person, an occurrence which perhaps does not take place once in ten years, it is therefore necessary that we should establish a minister at these places, especially in view of the fact that when any matter of communication of this kind is needed it can be made through a consul. I trust the committee will not accept the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 25, noes 64.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided, but before the result of the division was announced.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR said: I withdraw the point of order. So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Colombia and Ecuador, $10,000.

Mr. HITT. I do not wish to delay the committee needlessly, but desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, page 2, strike out the words "and Ecuador."

Mr. HITT. The effect of the amendment will be to make the mission to Colombia a single one, and not a consolidated mission united with Ecuador.

I called attention yesterday to the extreme inconvenience of joining these two missions. The chairman has said that such amendments as I offer increase expenditures. Not at all, Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely continues the existing law, and he proposes to make a change in the present system, by sweeping away the minister at Ecuador and delegating his duties to a man who has already charge of the interests of our Government in a capital as practically remote from the capital of Ecuador as Minneapolis is from Canton.

I make this motion not to delay the gentleman's bill, but in the interest of the public service. I do it after some observation of the operations of our foreign service, and because I believe that if we sustain a mission at all it should not be a mockery, as this mission to Ecuador would be—a mission that we know will not be actually filled would be better to abolish it entirely than to keep it up with a statutory sneer at Ecuador in this manner. I make the motion trusting to the practical good sense of gentlemen here who care for the interests of our country. We need effective representatives. This amendment will provide a minister to Colombia, and then, after adopting it, we can add a minister to Ecuador.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman from Illinois please explain the difficulty of communication between these two countries, when the duties of minister to both are performed by one man?

Mr. HITT. The difficulty in performing the duty of minister in the Republic of Colombia and in Ecuador at the same time is exceedingly great, because the minister when at one capital must, in order to see the public men of the other capital, make a journey which will take him near three months. It is a journey by mule, by boat, by rail, by steamboat, and by wagon. There are mountains to cross and rivers to follow and seas to traverse. It is a most inconvenient and impracticable combination.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the gentleman to state that it takes three months to reach the capital of one of these countries from the other?

Mr. HITT. It will take a minister that long, certainly, if he is traveling with his family. I am informed that under the best circumstances this journey could not be made in less than sixty days, while the ordinary time is eighty days, and from that up to ninety, ninety-three, or ninety-four. It is a difficult journey, and therefore this is an improper and unsuitable union of posts that should be entirely separate, being not only widely apart in distance, but in time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador were once recommended to the House for a single mission, in the Forty-fourth Congress, the recommendation, as I have said, being made by Mr. Keim, who had visited these countries for the purpose of studying these very questions. This arrangement at Colombia and Ecuador is, in my mind, strengthened by a gentleman who was minister at Colombia during the last Administration, and who thought that there was no difficulty about making the proposed combination. These are small countries. Ecuador has a population of 1,271,861, composed in large part of Indians, a very small number being white people.

The gentleman's speech itself indicates that there has been but little progress made in civilization. Its roads are mule roads, its railway system insignificant, its relations to us I can not conceive are of so much importance that we must have somebody there every minute at the court to make communications between the two countries on affairs of state; and I trust the committee will not see fit to adopt the amendment the gentleman has proposed. His speech indicates that if adopted it may be followed by another to put Ecuador as an independent state by itself. It destroys the whole theory of the committee.

Mr. HITT. I wish to state to the gentleman that he is correct. I did mean to imply that there should be a second amendment, either establishing a mission to Ecuador or sweeping it all out. I do not believe in your methods.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill as it now reads:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Colombia and Ecuador, $10,000.

There has been no minister to Ecuador, until recently, for years. It was not deemed of sufficient importance that the United States should have a minister at Ecuador until one year ago, I believe. I think in the last diplomatic and consular appropriation bill that was passed by this House there was a provision for the appointment of a minister to Ecuador by the President. The President of the United States did not seemingly regard that mission of sufficient importance to make an appointment until a few weeks ago, when he did appoint a gentleman.

I do not believe he has gone yet. If he has, he sailed but recently. I believe that one minister to Colombia and Ecuador will be able to attend to the business there. It is true that at present communication is not direct for travel, and it may take some time to pass from the capital of one country to that of the other, but that is not unusual. The United States minister to Bolivia is also the minister to Peru, and I see no reason why this should not stand as it is, and as the committee have reported it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Does not the gentleman think the argument in favor of this railroad survey, which the gentleman made yesterday, would be also an argument in favor of sending a minister to Ecuador? Would it not be in the same line of progress?

Mr. MCCREARY. The United States has been able for years to get along without a minister at Ecuador.

Mr. BLOUNT. We have a consul-general there.

Mr. MCCREARY. And as we have got along very well for years without a minister there, I can not see any objection to having the minister to Colombia visit Ecuador occasionally.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But we have also got along without the railroad. The gentleman wants the railroad. I want the railroad and I want the minister, and I think the same argument will apply to each.

Mr. MCCREARY. When your railroad is completed connecting Ecuador and Colombia, you may then present your proposition for a minister; but I see no connection whatever between the construction of a railway for the purpose of improving commerce and trade between the United States and the republics of Central and South America, and the gentleman's point of having two ministers at $5,000 each, one in Colombia and one in Ecuador.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. One or the other of the countries must be neglected.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say that I am well acquainted with the trade with Ecuador, and I think the consul-general is quite sufficient to represent the interests of our Government, so I shall oppose the amendment. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Venezuela and Guatemala, $5,000 each, $10,000.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out lines 14, 15, and 16, and inserting—

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Venezuela, $7,500.
Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Guatemala, $7,500.

The latter part of the amendment I would prefer to modify, should the first part of the amendment prevail; and I will offer the first part of the amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send up his amendment?

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. HITT:

Strike out lines 14, 15, and 16, and insert:

"Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Venezuela, $7,500."

Mr. HITT. If that is adopted it is to be followed by an amendment touching the remainder of the paragraph.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the law at present provides for a minister of the United States at Caracas, Venezuela, at $7,500. This bill would cut it down to $5,000. That is one of the most considerable republics of Spanish America, one of the leading powers in the northern part of that continent. The Government and people are at this time in the midst of great anguish and trouble. Venezuela is threatened within, it is more than threatened without. While the Government is trembling in the balance with intestine war, and unable to defend its territory, a large part of the Republic has been taken possession of by Great Britain. The United States is content to stand idly by in utter indifference, and the representatives of the American people occupy a large part of an afternoon, as they did yesterday, listening to lofty orations on the Monroe doctrine, while the flag of the British monarchy is displacing the flag of the Venezuela Republic; a monarchy pushing a pretended claim is invading and colonizing the continent in direct defiance of the traditions of this Republic and our Monroe doctrine.

At this juncture the House of Representatives is asked to change the law in order to cheapen and lower the representation to the Venezuelan Republic. Instead of friendly interest or sympathy for Venezuela, we continue the mission to England, in all its fullness, and send a cheaper man to Venezuela, just now so hard pressed. Its people will know how to interpret this action. There was no one so blind or ignorant in this country that he did not know what was the position of England towards us in the great strife of the rebellion. And who does not to-day remember with gratitude the attitude of Russia then? Devotion to the Monroe doctrine has been often repeated in this House. It is at last turned into cant. Now, when one of our neighbor republics is in great trouble, and a region as wide as one of our great States is being torn from that dismembered Government and added to an European monarchy, we turn from our republican sister coldly, our flag flutters idly, and the loud Monroe doctrine roars you very gently.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the strained conclusion stated by my friend a few moments ago. The bill is simply a proposition to reduce the salary of the minister at Venezuela, to take effect after the 30th of June of next year.

Mr. COOMBS. Not this year?

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not at the present time affect the salary of the minister at Venezuela at all. If it did, Mr. Chairman, how does it happen that the Monroe doctrine breaks in here? If the Monroe doctrine is being violated by Great Britain, is this the way to meet the question? We have an Executive, having charge of our foreign relations, knowing the history and sentiment of this country, and is it not within his power immediately to have communication, in this capital, with the British minister, and through him with Lord Salisbury, in this matter?

Now, then, as to his views upon this question and its purposes and results, I have been astounded at the zeal with which my friend states argumentation here, which I do not think always bears criticism well. The gentleman has alluded to the action of Great Britain during the rebellion. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate readily the gentleman's feeling toward Great Britain in that connection, and to it I have no complaint. But, sir, I am as ready this day and this hour to stand by the Monroe doctrine and stand by the flag as the gentleman in this issue; but I do not intend to be beguiled by this sophistry into an expression and into an increase of the salary of the minister at Venezuela.

Mr. POST. An increase?

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendment increases the salary.

Mr. HITT. I move to strike out the last word. I do not propose to increase this minister's salary, but to keep it unchanged, and I oppose an effort to degrade the mission at this moment, because it is an expression of utter want of sympathy with the Republic of Venezuela. Were it not for the short time in debate under the five-minute rule I could read you from the books on international law to show that cheapening or withdrawing a minister is by universal usage regarded as the plainest expression of a want of sympathy and of diminished respect, especially when the moment selected is critical to the fate of the other state. Discontinuing a mission at a time when another country is in a great struggle is the simple way of saying, "We care nothing about you." I think that we should let that mission alone. I think it is bad policy at this moment to cut that mission down to starvation rates.

It is bad, too, as business. Caracas is probably the place of costliest living in South America. A minister and his family can not live there decently on $5,000 a year. It is bad as business, for we have a large commerce with that country. In the year ending June, 1888, Venezuela imported from the United States $4,000,000 worth of merchandise, and we bought of them over nine millions. With such a trade, widening every day, it is poor business policy for us to chill their friendship for us, and manifest our cold disrespect for them. My reference to the Monroe doctrine was directly pertinent, and every patriotic man who will look at this situation in a spirit of calmness and wisdom will see that this mission ought not to be degraded.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Just one word in reply. I can not accept the doctrine that, the people of this country in reducing the expenses of their Government, any foreign Government shall construe it as offensive to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Georgia that debate is exhausted on this amendment, the pro forma amendment having been withdrawn.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I ask for a vote.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Georgia if he has information as to the expense of attending that mission and as to the cost of living at Caracas.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not thoroughly acquainted with the expense of living at Venezuela.

Mr. BURROWS. How long has the salary been $7,500 a year?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not remember. I have not run it down to see.

Mr. BURROWS. What reason is there for striking it down from $7,500 to $5,000 a year without any information as to the cost of living there?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not here to be interrogated by the gentleman, as a schoolteacher. I have stated in a general way that our purpose was to reduce these salaries and reduce the expenses wherever we thought we could; and I believe, sir, we can get a man to go to this little country for the amount that is stated in this bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I did not make the inquiry of the gentleman as a schoolteacher, but as a statesman, in order to see whether ample provision was made for a proper maintenance of our foreign relations. For that reason I asked him the expense attending that service.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know the cost of living at hotels in Caracas.

Mr. BURROWS. I am advised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] that it is one of the most expensive places to live in South America.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. And certainly $7,500 a year is not too much.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt about it. I have no doubt that the gentleman thinks all these amendments are wrong.

Mr. MCCREARY rose.

Mr. REED. Perhaps some other member of the committee may enlighten us. Perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] can tell us why this reduction is made.

Mr. BURROWS. If these reductions are made just for fun, we want to know it.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is not any fun for your side.

Mr. BURROWS. Is there a reason for this action?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, there are reasons.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman has not disclosed them, then.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman and I differ about that.

Mr. REED. Why not give us a reason?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, you do not want any reason.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; just reason enough to satisfy one-third of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, nothing would satisfy you. These people over there are your pets, and you want them taken care of.

Mr. REED. I, unfortunately, have not got any of them, so I do not think that is a fair reply to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. If we keep these salaries up, with your luck about such things, you will not get anything, while if they are made smaller you may. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. That is, if they are reduced I may have a chance? Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I knew there must be reasons. Now, there is a reason that satisfies me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the paper which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CARACAS, December 30, 1891.

In the Daily Chronicle, of Georgetown, No. 4923, under date of the 16th of September last, appears a speech read by the governor of Demerara before the combined court of that colony, in which among other things there is suggested to said body the convenience of establishing a department of government and police in Alto Cuyuni, and as a consequence thereof the authorization of the court for the appropriation of a certain sum to carry out the idea.

As this step is in the direction of exercising jurisdiction over territory that Venezuela considers as comprised within her limits, which the government is forced to qualify as a further act of usurpation on the part of the British authorities, the President of the Republic, pursuant to the duties imposed upon him by his position as guardian and defender of the national interest, has resolved, by and with the advice of the council of ministers and the approving vote of the Federal Council, to solemnly protest before all the civilized nations of the world against the new intent of the emissaries of England with respect to territory the absolute possession of which the Venezuelan Government demands with irrefutable historical titles and in the name of the principles of international law.

For the national executive.

FELICIANO ACEVEDO.

Taken from Boston Herald of January 18, 1892.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I sent up that dispatch from Caracas, and asked to have it read in order to show the bearing of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] with reference to the Monroe doctrine. It seems that there has been in the last few months some question raised in regard to the encroachments by Great Britain in Venezuela, and that dispatch explains the matter. I think, however, I can recall that the President of the United States has within the past few weeks interfered to a certain extent, under the McKinley bill, with some of the imports from Venezuela to the United States; and while we are considering these movements with regard to Venezuela, and these interferences with the trade between that country and this, it is well enough not to forget the action of the President under what is known as the McKinley reciprocity act.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak upon this subject—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BURROWS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended participating in the debate upon this question, but as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and other gentlemen upon his side of the House so persistently, and with such earnestness, demand a reason why we are impressed with the necessity of reducing expenses, I will endeavor to enlighten them, and I will inform him and them that the legislation of the Republican party during the last twenty years has reduced the incomes and impaired the prosperity of the great mass of our people until to-day there is pinching poverty all over our land, poverty in our rural districts, and squalid misery in our cities.

Millionaires with the pomp and pride of wealth rear their palatial homes, while almost within their shadows is heard the cry of want and suffering, and under the unjust tax legislation of the Republican party the salaries provided for in this bill are almost entirely contributed from the labor and sweat of the working people of our land.

The billion dollars poured out with lavish hand by the last Congress was the crowning work of these enemies of the people; this money was earned by the wage-workers, and these American citizens call to us in thunder tones to rectify this cruel wrong. The billion-dollar Congress has been denounced by 65,000,000 freemen. A wail of woe comes up from all quarters of our country, and a demand that the friends of the people, the Democracy of our country, shall relieve them from burdens too heavy to be borne, is wafted to us in every breeze.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will yield just for a question.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. If you sympathize so much with the poor people and are so apprehensive of a "wall of woe" coming up from that quarter, why is it that the salaries of the poor consuls who receive only $1,500 a year have the same amount, $500, taken from them that is taken from salaries of $3,500, the reduction in the one case being 33 percent and in the other 14 percent?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I see the point which the gentleman wishes to make, and I am glad to inform him I have an amendment written out which will correct all that. I propose to cut them all down. At the proper time I will propose an amendment which I trust will meet the approbation of all friends of economical and honest government.

Mr. Chairman, there is also another very important question which it seems to me has been forgotten. I wish to call attention to the fact that nearly all the diplomacy which has been valuable to our people has been conducted by envoys and ministers at a period when salaries were only about one-third the salaries that are now paid to these officials, all of which is taken from the laboring people of our country. During the Revolution Franklin accomplished more in the way of diplomacy than has every been done by all the diplomats that have followed him from that time to this. He did much towards drawing to us aid which was essential to our success.

Monroe, on a salary of less than $9,000, represented our country abroad, and by his diplomacy acquired that great territory embracing more than a third and nearly one-half of the square miles of this country. Forsyth, on a salary of about the same figures, gave us by his diplomacy that land of sun and flowers now constituting the State of Florida. For one, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to sending—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended a few minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. HITT. I move to strike out the last two words, and yield my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. Mr. Chairman, for one I am opposed to the policy that I have heard announced more than once in this Hall—that we must have men of large salaries and men of wealth to represent this country in European and other foreign countries. I want to have persons sent to represent us who are distinguished for moral and mental and intellectual worth—men fitted to represent a country of the character which we insist is possessed by this land of liberty—men fitted to represent a country which is a republic in fact as well as in name.

Mr. BOATNER. Do you think we can get men enough of that sort on such salaries as you suggest?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will inform the gentleman that this country is filled with men eminently fitted by education, culture, and moral attributes, who would adorn any court of any land.

I will say to the gentleman that if we could send such a man as Senator DANIEL to represent us in the court at London, allowing him only the same salary that he draws here as a Senator, he would live upon that salary in London and would reflect more credit upon this country than if you should send there the concentration of all the millionaires of our land to flaunt money in the face of astonished Europe. [Applause.] The world is getting tired of the glare and tinsel of wealth, and longs for men with intellectual and moral endowments.

Mr. BOATNER. But we have only one Senator DANIEL, and he would not go abroad. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is true, but then we have the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana who has just taken his seat. [Laughter and applause.] And I will say to him that if he were sent abroad upon the salary which he draws in this Hall as a Representative of the people he would reflect much more credit upon our country by his intellect and information than is reflected upon it by some of the millionaires who have represented us in foreign parts, some of whom only attracted attention by the exhibition of their wealth. [Applause.] There are many others, and one who is participating in this debate has the respect and regard of us all, one who has and I trust may again serve us in a high capacity abroad. There are some men, I am happy to observe, who are not enervated by wealth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, early in this session I had the honor to introduce a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, because some gentlemen seem to have forgotten its purpose; and I am afraid some of the members of our Appropriation Committee have not given the resolution that attention which it merits.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 12, 1892.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama submitted the following, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas the members of this House are deeply impressed by the evidence before them of the financial distress which prevails in the rural districts of our land; and whereas the income of our citizens is much less and the cost of living is much less than at the time the salaries of officials were fixed by law: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That it is the sense of this body that all salaries of Government officials of $5,000 or salaries which exceed that amount should be reduced 20 per cent, and that salaries which exceed $800 should be reduced 10 per cent.

Second. That the committees of this House charged with the preparation of appropriation bills be instructed in preparing such bills to fix the salaries and the appropriations therefor of all officials in conformity with the first section of this resolution.

Third. That the word "officials" shall be construed to include all persons who are paid salaries from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, when our Government had such eminent men as I have named representing us, our entire diplomatic service cost only $40,000 a year. This bill in its provisions for the pay of ministers and consuls involves an expense of almost a million dollars. One million dollars for bad service; and $40,000 for the good and devoted service of such eminent men as Franklin, Monroe, Forsyth, and others not less distinguished.

Just think of it, $1,000,000 paid out to envoys and consuls, a sum equal to the entire amount spent for all the civil and miscellaneous expenses of the Government during two years when Washington was President.

During our early days large salaries were not necessary to get the best talent. Thomas Jefferson, Edmund Randolph, and Timothy Pickens each served as Secretary of State at a salary of $3,500. Alexander Hamilton served as Secretary of the Treasury for the same salary. Gen. Henry Knox and Timothy Pickens each served as Secretary of War at a salary of $3,000. Samuel Osgood and Joseph Habersham each served as Postmaster-General at a salary of $3,000, and such men as Randolph, William Bradford, and Charles Lee filled the office of Attorney-General at the same salary.

This shows that extravagant salaries are not necessary to secure the services of the greatest and best men, and I want to admonish this body that the time has come when something must be done for the people. Distress prevails all over our land. The people demand justice. Shall we be recreant to our trust? An expectant people are listening with attentive ear.

Let us one and all by our votes in this Congress give an answer that will lighten millions of hearts and carry joy and happiness to the homes of those whom we are here to serve and whom to serve well should be our highest ambition. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has failed to answer my question, I wish to make myself understood in regard to it. I do not think he understood the point I was making. I wish to know why it is that the provisions of this bill reduce the salaries of twelve consuls now drawing $1,500 each 33 per cent, while the salaries of men who draw $3,500 each are reduced only 14 per cent. In other words, the gentlemen who have framed this bill propose to take as much money off the $1,500 salary as they do off the $3,500 salary. I would like to know from the gentleman from Alabama whether this will not cause a "wail of woe," as he expresses it.

This bill is in the interest of wealthy men; it is framed along that line all the way through. You have cut down these salaries so low that no poor man in this country can afford to accept a consulate. You have framed this bill in the interest of men who want to use these consulships as a means of making pleasure trips, trips across the continent or around the world, partly at the expense of the Government and partly at their own expense. The system already has this character to a very large extent, and there are now many consulships which no poor man can fill. Besides this, you make it impossible for the United States to have a citizen of this country as a consul in any of these places named in the bill where the salary is reduced from $1,500 to $1,000. You compel the United States in these places to borrow a foreigner and use him to represent our Government in regard to its commerce and its trade. You have not reduced the salaries of the ministers who get $12,000 and $17,500 a year, but have reduced the small salaries. I think I can make a suggestion which will be beneficial to the Democrats of this House. Cut down the Army and Navy appropriation bill as you have done this bill, and when we get into a war let us borrow ships from England or France or Germany; let us borrow our navy from some other country. That would be statesmanship, would it not? That would be economy. It would be just as wise as are the provisions of this bill which make these reductions of salaries.

Then we would need no army or navy, and when we get into a war we would only need to borrow the army or navy of some other country to fight our battles. I think that would be an exceedingly good platform for the Democratic party to adopt. It would be cheap. They could put it in their national platform, and go before the country with this grand system of economy. No doubt it would be received with the same cheers and plaudits which greet this bill. I have rarely seen such unwise legislation as that proposed in this bill. It will prove a calamity to the country and a blockade to our trade and commerce.

THE CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted, and if there be no objection the Chair will regard the pro forma amendment as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It pains me exceedingly to be compelled to differ from my fellow-members on this side of the House on any question, but I come from a constituency which is in constant contact with the people of these various countries, and they and I know the existing conditions. If, then, I differ from them they must not look upon it as a willful difference, but as an honest, conscientious difference on the part of a man who represents what he knows to be the just wishes and interests of his people.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a clipping from a newspaper, which is of importance in this connection. If I believed, sir, for a moment that this country was too poor to be properly represented abroad; if I believed that we were in a state bordering on national poverty, or extreme distress, I should have more sympathy with the plan for reducing expenses now proposed, although I should even then consider it a mistaken policy. But I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WHAT THE WORLD OWES—INCREASE OF WEALTH IN THE UNITED STATES UNEQUALLED IN HISTORY.

WASHINGTON, April 18.

The Census Office to-day issued a bulletin giving a summary of national, State, and local indebtedness for the year ended June 1, 1890. The compilation embraces details of the indebtedness of more than 30,000 political corporations in the United States.

The debt of the world in the census year, including $1,689,740,252, local and foreign debt, less sinking fund, was $30,358,132,938. The average annual decrease in the national debt of the United States in the decade exceeded $100,000,000; the decrease per capita of combined national, State, and local debt in the same period was from $80.73 to $32.37. The value of property assessed for taxation increased meanwhile from $17,000,000,000 to $25,500,000,000 or 50 per cent, a reduction of debt and an increase of wealth unequalled in the history of any country, at least in modern times.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOMBS. I can not yield to the gentleman now.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, at the present time to discuss the financial condition of the United States; the official report which has been read proves that we are not a poor nation without resources, but the most prosperous in the family of nations. I have the charity to suppose that a great deal of this talk of poverty indulged in here has been in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. REED. Oh, we all understand that.

Mr. DAVIS. It is derived from the census reports, at all events.

Mr. COOMBS. That there is great lack of general distribution of wealth can not be denied, but that poverty is so general and widespread as represented I do not believe. I claim that if the Government of this country was properly administered and the taxes properly levied—

Mr. SIMPSON. But that is just the difficulty.

Mr. COOMBS (continuing). That our people would have no need to complain of poverty when needed appropriations were asked for, but we would be in a condition to command all that we require for the dignified, efficient, and liberal administration of government.

Mr. WATSON. Better make the necessary change in the law first, perhaps.

Mr. COOMBS. Now, in relation to this amendment, I think a minister to Venezuela, knowing as I do the cost of living there, should have at least $7,500. My house always gives to our traveling salesman, when visiting there, $12 a day for living expenses when he arrives in that country. I do not believe that a man can live there as the representative of this country for less than $7,500 a year. Guatemala, I think, is a cheap country to live in. That can be made $5,000.

But I do not believe, sir, that we could have proper representation in Venezuela for less than the sum I have named, when I know as a matter of fact that we are compelled to allow $12 a day for our salesmen there for living expenses.

Mr. REED. That would amount to about $4,200 per annum?

Mr. COOMBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. And the proposition is to give the ambassador of this country $800 a year more—a liberal allowance. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a pending amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman from New York has sent to the desk and had read a clipping, I presume from a newspaper, and says that the figures are taken from the Census department, showing that the wealth of this country has enormously increased in late years. Indeed, there is nobody who disputes this fact, for it is currently believed and understood that the wealth of the country has increased, but that a large proportion of it has passed into the hands of a very few men. It is currently believed that 25,000 people in the United States at the present time own one-third of the entire aggregate wealth of the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, the objection we make to these expenditures where they are not absolutely necessary is that they are collected through taxation on the people of the country; and that system of taxation that raises revenue from a tariff should be equitably and uniformly adjusted, when as a matter of fact I want to tell you Democrats on this floor that the burden falls most heavily upon the laborers and producers of this country.

If this increase of expenditures was paid by the men who have this wealth in their possession, I would raise no objection to it; but the difficulty is that these increased expenditures are paid by the laboring and producing classes, under your present system of taxation, and that is why we object to them.

Now, all this plea about being represented in foreign countries with dignity, and all this plea by gentlemen on the Republican side about hurting the feelings of these nations, and the claim that we want to cultivate friendly relations with them, comes because they want to establish an almshouse or a house of refuge for their defunct politicians. [Laughter.]

Simply because they know they are going to lose their grip on the Government of this country. A party that to-day has a majority in only twelve States of this Union; a party with eighty-eight members in this House, only sixty-four of them having majorities behind them; a party having forty-seven United States Senators, and only eighteen of them having majorities behind them, can well see the handwriting on the wall, and must necessarily be anxious to provide a house of refuge for their defunct politicians in the future. So I can readily see why they would defend the keeping up of a large number of consular positions. But as to the Democrats, I can not see how they can defend an increase in the expenditures of the Government, because they went before the country two years ago on the plea that they were going to reduce the expenditures of this country. Yet I am sorry to say they have come up here and in every instance where there was an opportunity have passed large appropriation bills for the Navy and the Army, a large part of which were unnecessary. Now, I will say to the Democrats, you have got to fulfill some of your pledges to the people of this country if you expect to have a majority in the Congresses that are to come.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS] withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. COOMBS. I withdrew it, but I wish to substitute another amendment, that the salary of the minister to Venezuela shall be $7,500, and to Guatemala $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. HITT. I notified the Chair I would offer that, if this amendment prevailed; but it would be done in a separate paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the amendment?

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HITT) there were—ayes 36, noes 70.

Mr. HITT made the point of no quorum, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HITT and Mr. BLOUNT.

Pending the division,

Mr. SIMPSON said: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to ask whether it is proper and parliamentary to make the point of no quorum when a great number of the members of this House may have gone to attend the horse races and the base-ball game?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OATES in the chair). The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry. If it is, the gentleman from Kansas can answer it as well as the Chair can.

Mr. SIMPSON. I withdraw the inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is to inquire whether any member of this House has the right, without proof, to say that any of the members are at a horse race?

Mr. SIMPSON. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I do not say they are there. I asked if it was in order, if they were there.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think it might be considered in the light of an insinuation.

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not give my question such a violent interpretation as that.

The tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 104.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order a call of the roll under the rule.

The roll was called, and the following-named members failed to respond:

The committee then rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill H. R. 7624, and found itself, while proceeding, without a quorum. The Chair caused the roll to be called and 154 gentlemen only answered to their names as present. Being still without a quorum, the committee rose under the rule, and I report the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee found itself without a quorum, and that he caused the roll to be called and noted the absentees. The names of the absentees will be entered on the Journal.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. TURPIE. I present a memorial of the Indianapolis Typothetae Association, in which the memorialists state as follows:

We desire to call to your attention the evident injustice practiced by the United States Government in furnishing printed envelopes to anyone desiring them at the price of the cost of envelopes only, with one charge for the printing, and without any charge whatever for freight or delivery. By estimate, the number of envelopes furnished the mercantile community in this way exceeds 300,000,000. Our objections are based upon the ground that the Government has no right to set up opposition to private enterprise or invade its field, and that such action is a clear deprivation to the printers of the country of an actual revenue of not less than $250,000; that the injustice to the printers extends far beyond this sum by reducing the price on all envelope printing to a ruinous degree because of the unequal and unfair competition of the Government; that the advantage to the Post-Office Department is certainly small; and that therefore the Government can not be defended upon either that ground or the principle of "the greater good to the greatest number," for the advantage thus offered by the Government is made use of principally by large firms and corporations better able to pay for what they get than are the smaller concerns, who naturally can not, and in fact do not, except in very few cases, take advantage of such privilege.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TURPIE. I introduce a bill, and I hope I shall be indulged in being allowed to say that the object of the bill is to relieve any soldiers now in the classified service or who may hereafter be appointed from competitive examination in the civil service of the United States in applications for promotion. We are well aware that in the class of soldiers now serving many of them are those who did not have the advantages in early life of education; that those persons who were engaged in service in the armies of the Union occupied a great part of the time in the prime of their life in labors not necessarily educational and not very well adapted to early educational training. I hope, therefore, that the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, to which the bill will be referred, will give the measure early consideration, and that the soldiers now engaged in the civil service will have the benefit of its provisions as well as those ex-soldiers of the Union who may hereafter be appointed.

The bill (S. 3024) to exempt veterans from competitive examinations in the classified service of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

Mr. COLQUITT introduced a bill (S. 3025) for the relief of the Fulton Bag and Cotton Mills Company, of Atlanta, Ga.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BARBOUR introduced a bill (S. 3026) to mark the birthplace of James Madison, fourth President of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3027) granting pension to Celestia P. Hart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 3028) for the relief of William P. Dunwoody; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. In connection with the bill, I desire to say that I hope the Committee on Claims will take early action upon the subject-matter of the bill, as I think it is one involving decided merit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 3029) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River, in the State of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT THEATER LICENSES.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and hereby are, instructed to report to the Senate forthwith what action, if any, they have taken to make building regulations to carry into effect the joint resolution "to regulate licenses to proprietors of theaters in the city of Washington, D. C. and for other purposes," approved February 23, 1892; also whether said Commissioners have issued any permits for theaters or public halls to be constructed at any considerable height above the level of the street.

CHEYENNE AND ARAPAHOE RESERVATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Resolution by Mr. JONES of Arkansas relative to the President's message of February 18, 1892, upon the appropriation of March 3, 1891, for payment to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations for their interest in the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation, Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday I believe I had the floor for the purpose of submitting some observations on this resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this question involves two or three million dollars, I should like to see a quorum present. There is no quorum here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Cullom,	Kyle,	Ransom,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present, and the Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. VEST. I have been detained upon a committee, and I ask the Senator from Iowa to permit me to make a report.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3022) authorizing the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company to sell, transfer, and assign to the Leavenworth Terminal Railway and Bridge Company the rights and franchise as granted by acts of Congress approved February 25, and March 2, 1889, and by act of Congress approved July 25, 1890, to report it favorably, with an amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time. It was up yesterday, and was referred by consent to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 26, after the word, "confirmed," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the bill, the words to be stricken out being as follows:

All subject, however, to the conditions named in said act of Congress.

And insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the conditions, limitations, and restrictions imposed by existing law upon the said Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company shall continue in force as to the said Leavenworth Terminal Railway and Bridge Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg the Senator from Iowa to yield to me a moment for a matter of morning business that ought to be transacted promptly.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to yielding with the consent of the Senator from Arkansas, who is in charge of the pending resolution. I do not wish the time unnecessarily occupied with business, inasmuch as by unanimous consent the pending question was to come up immediately after the morning business was disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is morning business.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, if the Senator has morning business, I yield.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a report from a committee, which I should be glad to have considered now.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, if the Senator from Arkansas yields.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 97) to fill vacancies which will occur in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on April 21, 1892, to report it favorably without amendment. The vacancies occurred one week ago and the Board would like to have them filled. The names mentioned are satisfactory to everybody, I believe. Three of them are reappointments.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to appoint Gen. William J. Sewell, Gen. Martin T. McMahon, Capt. John L. Mitchell, and Maj. George Bonebrake, managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the terms of office commencing on the 21st day of April, 1892, to fill vacancies which will occur by expiration of terms of office.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

Mr. DAVIS. I am obliged to be absent from the city for a few days, and I ask to be excused from service upon the conference committee on the so-called Chinese exclusion bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Minnesota will be granted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who is one of the conferees on that bill, will be absent also. I therefore ask that the Senator from Delaware be relieved from service on the committee and that some other Senator be appointed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, in consequence of the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], he will also be excused from service on the conference committee. Is it the desire that the Chair shall fill these two vacancies?

Mr. SHERMAN and others. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will appoint the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in place of the Senators who have been excused.

TELEPHONE LINE ON VIRGINIA COAST.

The bill (H. R. 7727) to authorize the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Virginia, from Cape Charles to Assateague Island, in aid of the preservation of life and property, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that that bill may take the place of the bill (S. 2806) to authorize the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Virginia from Cape Charles to Assateague Island, in aid of the preservation of life and property (Calendar No. 592), the House bill being the same exactly with the Senate bill reported, and I ask that Senate bill 2806 may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the House bill will be placed on the Calendar with the same number as the Senate bill, and the Senate bill will be postponed indefinitely. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

CHEYENNE AND ARAPAHOE RESERVATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, relative to the President's message upon the appropriation of March 3, 1891, for payment to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations for their interests in the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the resolution proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs and reported to the Senate by the Senator from Arkansas is a resolution in response to the message of the President of the United States, which message was read last evening, wherein the President calls the attention of Congress to an appropriation made by Congress at the closing hours of the last session, the appropriation carrying $2,991,450 to pay an alleged claim due from the United States to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. The resolution before us not only commits the Senate, if it shall be adopted, to a recommendation to the President for the immediate payment of this sum, but it commits the Senate to the reasoning and statements of the printed report which accompanies the resolution. The resolution provides in its terms—

That for reasons set forth in the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the President's message of February 18, 1892, etc.

This report I hold in my hand, and I wish to call attention to it, in view of the fact that the Committee on Indian Affairs not only ask us to agree to a resolution which shall provide for the payment, but also ask us by our votes to be committed to the reasons and arguments made use of in this report showing or claiming that this amount is due to the Choctaws and Chickasaws. Therefore the Senate must agree to two distinct propositions. It must affirmatively agree to the payment of the money, and it must affirmatively agree to the reasoning of this committee, which of course places the committee in these reasons in direct antagonism to the argument and presentations made by the President of the United States.

It is in the beginning worth while for us to know something of the origin of this appropriation, amounting in round numbers to $3,000,000, and I shall endeavor as near as I can to truthfully recite the history of the transactions.

It is enough for me to say that no committee of this body and no committee of the House of Representatives, as a separate and distinct measure, recommended this appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Senator permit a suggestion there?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is in error in that particular. The Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives did report as an independent measure a bill appropriating this sum for the purpose of the purchase of this land, and subsequently the proposition was attached here to the Indian appropriation bill; but an independent measure was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House, and was considered for two days in the House, but a vote was not reached upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kansas very properly says that the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives reported a bill, but it did not report this bill, and in the report that it made and the separate bill that it introduced it provided for a sum of 20 cents an acre less than is included in this appropriation. So, then, if we have the deliberate judgment of the House of Representatives as respects this question, it is a judgment which would reduce this appropriation a half million dollars, and as respects the question involved in this appropriation and lying behind it, it would reduce the appropriation and the commitments of this Senate one and one-half million dollars. Therefore, I say that no standing committee of the Senate and no standing committee of the House of Representatives has at any time reported a separate bill looking to the payment of the sum of money which was put upon this appropriation bill during the closing hours of the last Congress.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will bear with me a moment, I do not understand what action reduced this appropriation a half million of dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] corrected my statement by saying that I was mistaken when I said that no committee of either House in the last Congress had suggested the specific appropriation under consideration in the Senate. My response to him was that the bill reported to the House of Representatives, instead of allowing $1.25 an acre for this land, was in favor of allowing $1.05 an acre, making a difference of half a million dollars in favor of the United States as respects the sum involved in this appropriation.

Mr. President, it is well enough for us to consider the circumstances surrounding this appropriation when it was made. It was made upon the regular Indian appropriation bill of the last session of the last Congress; it was reported in a perfunctory way from the Committee on Indian Affairs and referred to the Committee on Appropriations in order that under our rules, if the Committee on Appropriations should fail to insert this item, it was an item in order on the Indian appropriation bill, coming as it did in this way from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I think I do not say what is outside of the record when I say that this question was not considered then in the Committee on Indian Affairs with that deliberation and care with which they would have considered a claim involving, as this claim does, $10,000,000, because, if this appropriation is agreed to, there lies behind it, on all-fours with it, another appropriation amounting in round numbers to $7,000,000, which we shall be bound in good faith by the votes we cast here to make at this session or some future session of Congress.

So there is not only involved in this question the appropriation thus made without consideration in the very closing and last hours of an expiring Congress, without that careful deliberation and consideration that a matter of such magnitude should have upon the floor of the Senate—it is true it was debated here, but not at any great length—but there was put upon this bill $2,991,450. How was that ascertained? It was ascertained by allowing these two tribes of Indians $1.25 per acre, without limitation or deduction, for 2,400,000 acres of land, in round numbers. It was put on by a vote in the Senate—I need not say against my protest, for the records will show it—and when it went to the House of Representatives, I will say here—I suppose I can speak of a Congress that has gone into history—it reached friendly hands there, and when that bill came back through a conference committee it came back with the House yielding to the Senate, which had put this item upon the bill.

The report before us sustaining this action of the two Houses of Congress is, I think, in some respects one of the most remarkable public documents which has ever found its pathway to our tables. If Senators will turn to it they will see that here are some eighteen maps—I do not know whether they are by the lithographic or the printing process—but there are eighteen maps appended to this report to elucidate the arguments made therein. Before controverting those arguments or going into them in detail I wish to briefly recite what I understand to be the law of this case. It is that by a treaty made in 1839 between the United States and the Choctaw Nation the Choctaws agreed to remove beyond the Mississippi and occupy certain territory described in that treaty.

In 1855—there were some intervening treaties, but I need not allude to them as there were none affecting this question—in 1855 the Chickasaws, having prior to that time been incorporated within the Choctaw Nation, the Chickasaws and Choctaws made a treaty with the United States covering a number of topics, but especially covering a portion of this land whereby they leased to the United States in perpetuity for the purposes of occupation and settlement by other Indian tribes, all of this land lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth meridians of west longitude from Greenwich. This lease in perpetuity for this particular purpose covered an area in round numbers of seven and a half million acres of land. That was in 1855, and under that a number of Indian tribes were placed upon this territory.

In 1866, there being a residuum of title as was supposed by those who made that treaty, the Choctaws and Chickasaws ceded this land to the United States for a consideration of $300,000 more, making a total sum for the two purposes of $1,100,000.

In that treaty, however, which was a new treaty, which I shall have occasion to allude to hereafter, because I am only stating what I understand to be the law governing this case; in that treaty, I think, it may be fairly said that the obligation of the Government of the United States to establish its political autonomy within the boundaries of the Indian Territory was not asserted, and therefore these Choctaws and Chickasaws and the other tribes within that Territory probably had a right to suppose that the governmental autonomy of these civilized tribes would remain, because it appears in the debates and in the legislation of that period that the political policy of the Government of the United States as respects its treatment of the Indians was to be the establishment of two great reservations, one in the Southwest and one in the Northwest, one known as the Indian Territory of the Southwest and the other as the Sioux Reservation in the Northwest; and it was the policy of those who then governed the affairs of this country, or supposed they did, that ultimately all the Indian tribes should be drawn in from outside reservations in Nebraska, in Kansas, in Minnesota, and other States, and would be finally placed on one or the other of these two reservations. So the question of the political autonomy of this region, known as the Indian Territory, was not involved in the treaty of 1866.

Taking into account the treaties which I have recited, I think I can maintain that, as respects the territory lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth meridians, the Choctaws and Chickasaws had alienated whatever of title they had prior to that time held in those lands.

Now, it may be curious to Senators who have not examined this report after this recital of the situation as respects this question, that we should find a series of maps here, the first one being a transcript of a map of 1703 and the last one a century later, perhaps. This committee, as a justification for this appropriation, states that this title is to be drawn from a treaty made in 1820 between the United States and the Choctaw Nation—over one hundred years afterwards—and that treaty I wish to quote from to show the basis of this claim.

In the first place, I want to read the preamble to the treaty, that is, the motive which actuated the Government of the United States and the Choctaw Nation in making it. The preamble reads:

Whereas it is an important object with the President of the United States to promote the civilization of the Choctaw Indians, by the establishment of schools amongst them; and to perpetuate them as a nation by exchanging, for a small part of their land here—

That embraced lands, I believe now in the State of Mississippi—a country beyond the Mississippi, where all who live by hunting and will not work, may be collected and settled together.

It seems that at that day, although the Choctaws were a civilized people who lived by industry in various ways in the State of Mississippi, yet there were among them persons who would not work and who desired to live by hunting. To get rid of those, the President of the United States, in the first article of this treaty, stated:

To enable the President of the United States to carry into effect the above grand and humane objects, the mingoes, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw Nation in full council assembled, in behalf of themselves and the said nation, do by these presents cede to the United States of America all the land lying and being within the boundaries following, to wit: Beginning on the Choctaw boundary, east of Pearl River, at a point due south of the White Oak Spring, on the old Indian path; thence north to said spring; thence northwardly to a black oak standing on the Natchez road about forty poles eastwardly from Doak's fence, marked A. J. and blazed, with two large pines and a black oak standing near thereto and marked as pointers; thence a straight line to the head of Black Creek or Bouge Loosa; thence down Black Creek or Bouge Loosa to a small lake; thence a direct course so as to strike the Mississippi 1 mile below the mouth of the Arkansas River; thence down the Mississippi to our boundary; thence around and along the same to the beginning.

Then article 2 says:

For and in consideration of the foregoing cession, on the part of the Choctaw Nation, and in part satisfaction for the same, the commissioners of the United States, in behalf of said States, do hereby cede to said nation, a tract of country west of the Mississippi River, situate between the Arkansas and Red River, and bounded as follows: Beginning on the Arkansas River, where the lower boundary line of the Cherokees strikes the same; thence up the Arkansas to the Canadian Fork, and up the same to its source; thence down to the Red River; thence down Red River, 3 miles below the mouth of Little River, which empties itself into Red River on the north side; thence a direct line to the beginning.

Upon that treaty, which was made in September, 1830, the committee bases—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator wants to get that date correct, I suppose. It was October, 1820, not September, 1830, as I understand him to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator. Certainly I wish to have it correct; it was October 18, 1820. That treaty was the beginning and the source of our obligation as respects the title to these lands between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth meridians. In order to establish that claim the committee oc-copy many pages in this report to show that under the treaty of 1803, whereby Louisiana was ceded to the United States, we had a right to grant these lands to the source of the Canadian River, and they argue that the United States in 1819, by a treaty with Spain, for a paltry purpose ceded away and sold to Spain that magnificent domain lying between the River Rio Grande and the River Sabine, then the boundary from the mouth of that river as fixed in the treaty of 1819. This committee goes so far as to quote resolutions which were offered in the House of Representatives antagonistic to the treaty with Spain of 1819, as showing that the Administration of Mr. Monroe, through the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, had surrendered and sold the magnificent patrimony between these two rivers.

I am not going into a discussion of that question. There is no Senator here who has examined that great subject but who is, in a general way, familiar with it, nor in the light of the history of that period do I suppose there is scarcely a Senator here but who would probably say that that treaty on the whole was a great treaty for the interests of the people of the United States. Yet if we vote for this resolution, we are committed to the argument that the United States frittered away, without consideration, the domain which is now comprised within the State of Texas and a portion of Colorado and New Mexico.

Mr. MORGAN. The treaty got rid of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, it got rid of it.

Mr. MORGAN. For what consideration was it?

Mr. ALLISON. It is perfectly well known to those who have studied that question that the western boundary of the territory of Louisiana was never fixed and assented to until the treaty of 1819. We had numerous difficulties with Spain on that subject. I am not going into that question, except to say that when this committee made an argument upon that subject, they should have stated the whole case and they should have stated that this was a mere adjustment of our difficulties with Spain, whereby Spain claimed not only the boundary which was fixed by that treaty, but claimed to come to a point between the river Sabine and the river Mississippi, and she held to that during all the negotiations from 1805 to 1819. She not only held to that, but she held that she had a right to take a portion of the State of Alabama from the river Perdido, if that is the point, to the Pearl River; at least there was a great contest in respect to that, and also in respect to West Florida.

Spain not only claimed that, but she claimed that because of her settlement at Santa Fe and east of Santa Fe her right and title to all that country was undisputed to the Missouri River itself. Not only that, but she claimed—and she never relinquished that claim until this treaty of 1819—that by virtue of occupation and by virtue of discovery she was entitled to the Pacific coast and the whole of it extending from San Diego to 54° 41', and we got rid of that claim, which has been over and over again stated as the strongest claim to the Pacific coast, by this treaty of 1819, whereby we secured undisputed possession, so far as Spain was concerned, of all the territory lying between 42° and 54° and 40' north latitude.

Under the circumstances, is it fair to say at this late day that we sold this territory when by these adjustments and arrangements respecting boundaries we secured what never had been settled before, a territory lying between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean, extending certainly from the forty-second degree to the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, and so far as Spain was concerned she never relinquished her claim and pretension to the country up to 54° 40', to which in 1844 it was openly declared we had a right clear and unquestionable and which resulted in the election of Mr. Polk upon the watchword of "fifty-four forty or fight"? And yet that very Administration yielded a territory now known as British Columbia lying between 49° and 54° 40' of north latitude, and nobody has ever said in the report that we sold that land to the British Government.

Mr. MORGAN. We gave that away.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. The Senator from Alabama says we gave it away. For one, I regret that we did. But whatever was done as respects that struggle, nobody has ever claimed that it was sold by the United States, as this report says we sold the land lying between the Sabine and the Rio Grande for the purpose of getting the petty possessions of East and West Florida.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question in the interest of correct information?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator spoke a few moments ago about certain governments having released all their claims to the territory of this country extending from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. The Senator does not mean by that expression to convey the impression that any government, either Spain or Mexico, or Great Britain or France, had any interest whatever in the territory which now comprises the States of Oregon and Washington?

Mr. ALLISON. No, Mr. President, I do not mean that. I know as well as the Senator knows that within a few days there is to be celebrated at Astoria the one hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the Columbia River by an American—Capt. Gray, of Boston, I believe, is the American—and the name of that river was changed by him to that which it now bears.

Mr. MITCHELL. And that American is entitled to be classed as the discoverer of all that country.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of that, nor shall I minimize in the slightest degree that magnificent journey of Lewis and Clark, beginning at the mouth of the Missouri in May, 1804, and reaching on the first of September the northern boundary of my own State, having traveled along that boundary most of the period for the four months intervening, whereby they traversed the region of the headwaters of the Columbia, and marked the whole way to its mouth; nor do I minimize other considerations which gave us a clear and undisputed title, as I believe, to that region of country where occurred the settlement of Astoria later on. But I am now speaking of the adjustment and settlement of boundaries in years gone by, when there was but little known of the country.

It is a strange thing that no man had entered the mouth of the Columbia River, one of the most beautiful rivers on this continent, until 1792, although the Spaniards for two centuries before had traversed up and down that river, as it is also a curious thing that it was left to La Salle to discover the mouth and source of the Mississippi River, although Spain had claimed the country around the Gulf of Mexico for two centuries before.

But at that time there was but little known of the geography of our country, especially in the interior. Who knew where the sources of the Canadian River were in 1820? Did anybody then know that they were in the very midst of the heart of that region now so well represented by the Senators from Colorado, abounding with precious metals? Who knew that one could go from the Canadian River directly south and strike the Red River, as it was declared he could do in this convention of 1820, and that a line from the source of the Canadian River directly south would strike more than 100 miles west of the source of the Red River. Yet that old treaty of 1820, whereby the Choctaws desired to get rid of their people who would not work and of the people who were fond of hunting, described a portion of those boundaries as being the source of the Canadian River.

I have gone into this for the purpose of showing how this pretension, if it is a pretension at all, was made by treaty with these Choctaws more than a year and a half after it was perfectly well known to every intelligent person in the United States that the boundaries of this region had been fixed by our treaty with Spain in April, I believe it was, 1819; but I do not remember the dates, I have not the treaty before me. Yet this old treaty of 1820, made for a few hunters, is brought in here as the basis of all we are to do as respects this title.

Mr. President, I have spent more time upon this subject than I should have spent, for the reason that this treaty of 1820, and if I am not correct here I want some Senator to point out my error—every vestige of it as relates to the boundary of this country was superseded by the treaty of 1830. So this treaty of 1820 has nothing to do with this question, and can not be dragged into it any more than you can drag into it the treaty whereby we acquired or lost any of our possessions.

Take the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaws. Article I of the treaty made on the 27th of September, 1830, provides:

Perpetual peace and friendship is pledged and agreed upon by and between the United States and the Mingoes, chiefs, and warriors of the Choctaw Nation of red people; and that this may be considered the treaty existing between the parties, all other treaties heretofore existing and inconsistent with the provisions of this are hereby declared null and void.

The second article of this treaty fixes and limits the boundaries of the Choctaw Nation in the Indian Territory, and fixes the limits and boundaries on the west as the limits and boundaries of the possessions of the United States of America, and those possessions by the treaty of 1819, which I have discussed, were the one hundredth meridian of west longitude from Greenwich. So this boundary of 1830 by its own terms was declared to be a fixed, definite boundary, and all other boundaries prior to that time were to be of no force as against either party.

Can there be any question about that? Is there anybody here who will say that the first article of the treaty of 1830, taken with the second article, which fixed the boundary, did not absolutely take away any force, if there was any (and there certainly never was), in that treaty of 1820, made a year and a half after the treaty with Spain?

Of course, in 1847 or 1848, when our treaty of peace with Mexico was made, we acquired all the territory which formerly belonged to Spain between these boundaries and the Pacific Ocean. In 1855—and it is a curious thing—another treaty was made with the Choctaw Nation and the Chickasaws, because then they were mingled, owning their lands in common, the Choctaws three-quarters and the Chickasaws one-quarter. In 1855 another treaty was made covering the land between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth meridians. In some way it was inserted in that treaty. I have yet to see wherein any one can explain it. This committee have been diligent and active in raking up old records running back to 1703. Why did they not show us something on the claim of the Choctaws and Chickasaws during all these intervening years to lands west of the one hundredth meridian after the treaty of 1830?

I will yield now to the Senator from Arkansas to give me any specific claim urged by the Chickasaws and Choctaws for that region between the one hundredth and one hundred and third and one-half meridian, if that is the region they claim.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this matter in detail in this way. I do not think there was any reference made to the land west of the one hundredth meridian for the reason that the Government of the United States conveyed by a treaty, solemnly ratified between the Choctaws and the United States in 1820, promulgated on the 18th day of October, all of the land described as read by the Senator from Iowa, which included the land west of the one hundredth meridian. In the following year, not the year before, as repeatedly stated by the Senator from Iowa, but in 1821, on the 23d day of February, a treaty was entered into between the United States and Spain by which the one hundredth meridian was made the line between Spain and the United States. From that time on, the Choctaws, being a dependent and weak people, recognized the fact that the Government of the United States had sold absolutely all of the land west of the one hundredth meridian that they claimed, and they did not assert any right to occupation or ownership.

There was plenty of country in the eastern part of the territory they had bought for them to occupy, and they simply kept alive their claim to compensation, but for the failure of title, for the Government of the United States failing to make good the land it conveyed to them before it was conveyed to Spain, the Government of the United States being a sovereign power and the Spanish Government being a great power, and this line having been fixed between these two powers, this nation of helpless Indians were absolutely powerless to do anything against them, but had to recognize what was an accomplished fact.

I have not looked through the records to see whether in any of the different treaties that were made any claim for compensation was made, but there was no objection on the part of the United States, so far as I know and so far as anything I have ever seen shows, to taking into consideration the claim of the Choctaws for that country west of the one hundredth meridian. The United States compensated for it in the treaty of 1855 and agreed to pay for it.

Mr. ALLISON. I yielded to the Senator on purpose that he might give to me some information on this point as, of course, those of us who try to look into these subjects know very well that in a long, complicated question of this character something may have been overlooked, and I did not know but that there was somewhere in the archives of this Government a distinct claim made by the Choctaws.

Mr. MORGAN. As a nation?

Mr. ALLISON. As a nation, a claim between the one hundredth and one hundred and third meridian.

Mr. MORGAN. It was a dependent nation, and not having any political status or any political autonomy independent of the United States, how could they, as a matter of diplomatic assertion, make any claim of that sort at all?

Mr. ALLISON. I only wanted to know the fact. Of course that is a proper argument to make.

Mr. MORGAN. If you gag a man there is no use in saying he can not talk.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Arkansas—and I can not allow that to pass—says I am mistaken as to when the treaty with Spain was made. It was made in 1819, but it was not ratified by the Senate of the United States until 1821. Its provisions, however, were as well known to the people of the United States after that treaty was made as anything could be known, because it was perfectly well known that the ruling powers in Spain refused for a year and a half to ratify that treaty because of certain objections they made to it, and it was not ratified by the United States until the late day I have named, although there could never have been mustered a corporal's guard, if I may use a military phrase, as respects the Senate or the House of Representatives, against that treaty on the floor of either House.

It is true that Mr. Clay and some of the opponents of John Quincy Adams and Mr. Monroe at that time—because then, as now, we were approaching a Presidential election—did object to this western boundary of the Louisiana purchase, but the resolution of Mr. Clay never came to a vote. It was merely debated hither and yon by three or four or five Senators and by a few members of the House, and then it passed, as a great many things pass, into the limbo of expired things.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. Although the treaty was originally signed in 1819, was it not simply a proposition for a treaty without any legal validity whatever until it was ratified and the ratifications were exchanged?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; but what I am undertaking to show now is, that this treaty ratified in 1821 is of no force and validity, so far as the question before us now is concerned, for the reason that no human being then knew, unless perhaps some of the old monks or missionaries about Santa Fe, where the forks of the Canadian River were. There were no missions in those mountains at that time. I submit to the Senator from Colorado that nobody had probed the source of the Canadian River; nobody had probed the source of the Red River, because if anyone had, the parties to the treaty never would have made that description in 1820. They only guessed within about 100 miles of it.

Mr. TELLER. Where does it rise?

Mr. ALLISON. Wherever it rises, I have tried to trace its source. It rises in those mountains.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator hold the Indians responsible for the want of knowledge of geography on the part of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Mississippi probably is able to answer that question. If I could study law a few years, I think I should agree with him upon that subject. At present I do not know that it is necessary for me to say more than to say that of course, the Indians would not be responsible for our ignorance.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator, if he will allow me, one other question? Was not the relation between the Indians and the United States, of dependency on the one side and supremacy and mastery on the other, of such a character as to authorize the Indians to rely on the assumed knowledge of the United States upon that subject?

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. So, Mr. President, having first disposed of the question of the treaty of 1820, and then having shown absolutely that it has no more to do with the issue there involved than a last year's almanac, and not so much, because by the treaty of 1830, ten years afterwards, which was a substantive and substantial treaty and one that was made with great deliberation, and not to get a few hunters who were idle away from Mississippi, but for the purpose of securing the removal of the Choctaws from the State of Mississippi—this treaty of 1830 was made. It was made with great deliberation and great care, and it abrogated every vestige of treaty inconsistent with it prior to that date. By that treaty of 1830 the State of Mississippi was relieved from the presence of the Choctaws. I need not go into the difficulties and trials and tribulations of that period in the State of Mississippi; I need not go into the history either of the conduct of the people of the United States acting through their Indian agents to get rid of the Choctaws and place them beyond the Mississippi River.

But now the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] directly, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] inferentially, say that here was a dependent nation, and that, although they never made any claim to this land west of the 100th meridian, yet they did not do so because they were a dependent people and they had not that vigor and courage and assurance necessary to assail a great government like the United States.

The history of this Choctaw Nation shows that they are a pretty vigorous people. They are the richest agricultural people on the face of the globe to-day within the area they inhabit. So far these dependent people, these people who are so easily imposed upon by a great government, have been tolerably alert.

We have had difficulties and troubles with the Choctaws. I will call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that, although they agreed in the treaty of 1830, in consideration of the cession to us of their lands in Mississippi, to receive the lands described in the treaty on our part west of the Mississippi, yet afterwards they came to the United States year after year and claimed that we were not only required to give them this immense domain west of the Mississippi in the Indian Territory, but that we were bound by that treaty in honor to pay them the net proceeds of all the lands which they had owned in the State of Mississippi. In season and out of season they pressed this claim and other claims collateral to it, and you will find these claims spreading through all the pathway of the correspondence between this Government and the Choctaws for a long period until 1855, when among other things in the treaty of that year they agreed that the United States Senate should be the arbiter, the judge as to what was due them on account of the net proceeds of the sales of their lands in Mississippi. So they seemed to know and did not hesitate to claim that the Government of the United States had violated, according to their view, the treaty.

In 1859 the United States assented to that arbitrament, and in 1859 the Senate solemnly sat upon that question. I had occasion to look it up the other day. I saw that, after a contest, the Senate went into executive session and continued in executive session for three hours—what doing I do not know—but after it came out of the executive session, Mr. Sebastian, of Arkansas, called up the resolution of the Committee on Indian Affairs, he being chairman of the committee, and Mr. King, of New York, objected because the Senate was so thin that a matter of that moment should not be considered. Mr. Sebastian was asked how much that claim involved, and he said it was a large claim.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator if that is not the claim that they subsequently established by a decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. ALLISON. That is just what I am speaking of.

Mr. TELLER. After fifty-eight years of contest?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And after the Senate had accepted the solemn responsibility of this adjudication between this Government and the Choctaw Nation, it took the Choctaws thirty years to get the money out of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. We shall go on upon that subject. I am now upon the point suggested to me by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that these Choctaws were too modest to make suggestions to the United States as respects their just claims against it.

Mr. MORGAN. They had not any right to do that.

Mr. ALLISON. I was merely endeavoring to illustrate that where they thought they had a good claim they had the courage to make it. Mr. Sebastian said that that sum would involve $800,000, and perhaps a million, and yet the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] calls my attention to the fact that after a long period the Supreme Court decided that the Indians were entitled to it. Of course the Supreme Court decided they were entitled to it, because by that treaty the Senate of the United States was made the arbiter.

Mr. TELLER. The Supreme Court decided that way.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly they did; and they stated that that arbitration by the people of the United States, through that treaty, was a binding arbitration, and the Government of the United States was bound by it. So it appears when the Indians had a claim they were not afraid to make it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but I wish he would tell me or tell the Senate before he gets through when these Indians parted with their interest in this land?

Mr. ALLISON. I will do that; and I will yield to the Senator from Colorado to show wherein I am wrong. I have endeavored to say that much.

Mr. TELLER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator from Iowa ought to take a distinction between claims for compensation or damages interposed by an Indian tribe against his own Government, the Government of the United States, for what it may consider an act of injustice done by that Government; but it would not be becoming, even in a sovereign State of the American Union, to enter a protest against fixing boundaries between two countries against the action of its own Government. I do not know that any State in this Union would dare to make a protest of that kind after the boundary had been changed and to assert it against the Government of the United States that that was ultra vires and the Government had not any right to convey away those lands.

The Indian has always been, as I understand, only too happy to have any allowance made of a claim for damages against the Government of the United States, but he never has set himself up to protest against the treaty-making power in changing boundaries between this country and Spain or any other country.

Mr. ALLISON. I, of course, do not know perhaps just what these Indians would do, but I am quite clear that if they had any title west of the one hundredth meridian they would have been able to say so to some one. I have undertaken to show that by the treaty of 1830 this boundary was fixed, and I have quoted from the treaty to prove it. Therefore I discard as surplusage, as a thing ultra vires, as the Senator from Alabama says, the treaty of 1820 as respects this question.

Mr. President, I have been somewhat diverted from what I was about to say upon this question by these interruptions, although I am glad to have them, because I certainly have no other interest in this matter than to get at the exact truth and to do equal and exact justice and liberal justice to the Choctaws as respects any claim they have against the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will not consider it an interruption, I should like to make a single suggestion here, that he may, if he deems it necessary, say something in answer to it. From the treaty of 1830, as I understand it, until the treaty of 1855, there was no treaty between the Government and the Choctaws concerning their lands or concerning their boundaries, but it is a matter of current history that notwithstanding the treaty of 1830 they insisted that they owned the lands west of the one hundredth degree of longitude, and in the treaty of 1855 the Government of the United States recognized that fact.

Mr. ALLISON. If that was a matter of current history between 1830 and 1855, I want somebody to point out that current history to me. I have looked for it in vain. I have seen every pretension made by the Choctaws respecting claims against the United States, but I have never seen a claim that they have made, in reports of Committees on Indian Affairs, through Indian agents, through superintendents of Indian affairs, or through any proper source or any source, showing that they had a claim against us for all the territory lying between the one hundredth and one hundred and third and one-half meridians.

I reassert that, and it brings me to the treaty of 1855, when we paid the Choctaws and the Chickasaws $800,000 for the territory lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth meridians. I undertake to say here, without fear of successful contradiction, that the primary source of that consideration was the lands which are called leased lands in common parlance, but they were lands granted in perpetuity, and that $800,000 was a price beyond the price that was then paid for lands of a similar character lying alongside of them in the State of Texas. It was a full consideration at that moment for all the lands in that territory as compared with the price of lands south of the Red River and west of it in the State of Texas.

The report undertakes to go back to 1820 for the purpose of showing that the $800,000 was a consideration for the release of lands west of the one hundredth meridian. I have shown, in the first place, that they had no lands west of the one hundredth meridian, and that therefore there could be no consideration for their release, and that whatever was paid, the $800,000, was paid for the lands between the ninety-eighth and the one hundredth meridians. Senator who deny these statements may reply as they will, but I want somebody to show me what became of the first and second articles of the treaty of 1830.

Mr. President, I deny absolutely the facts and reasonings and statements in the report as affecting the title to any land west of the one hundredth meridian. Why did not the report contain the cessions of 1830 in order that we might at a glance see what the effect of the treaty of 1830 was upon this great question?

I am occupying more time than I ought on this question. We come now to the treaty of 1866, and I want to say something respecting that treaty. That was one of the series of treaties running through all the Indians in the Indian Territory. It was a treaty intended to restore amicable and peaceful relations between the United States and these Indian tribes, notwithstanding the fact that the Choctaws particularly had forfeited every right and every treaty they had ever made with the United States. As to them can there be any doubt about that question? They were an independent government within the Government of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. The Supreme Court of the United States says they were a dependent government, not an independent government.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; perhaps I am a little unfortunate in my phraseology.

Mr. MORGAN. You are, in view of that decision.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Alabama for correcting me always, because in my method of speaking I sometimes do not speak with absolute accuracy; but I meant to say, and what I now do say, in order that I may not be criticised in respect to my language, is that the United States, by treaties prior to that time, had promised that these governments should have their own autonomy as respects themselves; and therefore, in my sense, they were not only an independent government but they were a government that had a right to call upon the United States to maintain that independence. That is what I mean to say. It is true, if they were invaded, as the Senator will see, they had a right to call upon us to maintain these rights for them. What I mean to say is that they, in the face of this fact, joined another and hostile government, and therefore forfeited all their rights, whatever they were.

Mr. MORGAN. The government they joined was held not to be any government at all.

Mr. ALLISON. There is certainly enough in this question without going into the controversy whether we had a Confederate Government or not. I do not want to touch that question now, or at any time in fact; but what I mean to say is that these people forfeited every right they had under the Government of the United States. They had large sums of money in the Treasury of the United States. Those sums were nominally drawing interest. We were their trustees and guardians as respects that money, and were bound to pay them semiannual interest. We did not pay it. By the treaty we promised to pay it, and in appropriation bills following the treaty we did pay it, dollar for dollar, during all the period of the rebellion, and we gave them complete amnesty.

I will not go into the details, but in making the treaty of 1866 the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] reminds me that the commissioners who negotiated with these Indian tribes communicated to them that they had forfeited every right. Without going at length into the treaties, it must be borne in mind that the Choctaws and Chickasaws had released to the United States, for purposes of establishing other Indian tribes, that territory west of the ninety-eighth meridian. In the third article of the treaty of 1866 they ceded this territory to the United States absolutely, and I believe that is admitted in the report.

Mr. PLATT. For an express consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. For a consideration of $300,000.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if that is the point where he claims the cession was made? Is that the point when they passed the title from themselves to the General Government?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the point; and in order that I may not make a mistake about it I will read the third article of the treaty:

The Choctaws and Chickasaws, in consideration of the sum of $300,000, hereby cede to the United States the territory west of the ninety-eighth degree west longitude, known as the leased district, provided that the said sum shall be invested and held by the United States, etc.

Going on and stating how the money should be disposed of, it is enough to say that the Government of the United States immediately or presently fully and completely discharged the obligation as respects the payment.

Mr. TELLER. Did they pay it?

Mr. ALLISON. They paid it.

Mr. TELLER. What became of it?

Mr. ALLISON. They have it now, except that the Chickasaws have not yet been paid because they did not comply with one of the provisions of this obligation; $17,000 of that sum is, I believe, yet due to the Chickasaws because they have not fully complied with their promises as respects the treaty. If this was not a cession what was it? They had turned over to the United States in perpetuity this land, but claimed a residuary title. They made an absolute cession of the land to the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question if agreeable to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAVIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator now contend that that was a cession to the United States Government of such a character that the Government could sell the land and put white settlers on it?

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for asking me that question, and I do not know but I may as well discuss it here as at any time.

Mr. PERKINS. As the Senator has been interrupted, perhaps he will permit an inquiry in this connection. Was not the $300,000 to be paid to the Choctaws and Chickasaws for the benefit of the freedmen residing among them in the event that they should take homes west of the home reservation of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and if they failed to do that was it not to be paid to the Chickasaws and Choctaws in consideration of the freedmen taking homes among the Indians, and have not the freedmen taken homes among the Choctaws, and for that reason was not their proportion of the money paid to the Choctaws?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. I did not see proper to read all the details of this treaty, but when Senators insist that this matter was the consideration and the only consideration as respects the freedmen, they fall far short of the situation. These freedmen were slaves in the Choctaw Nation and the treaty emancipated them. I do not know what the fact may be; it may be that they were nominally emancipated before. Some Senator more familiar with their history can state whether that is true or not. I know it was true as respects some tribes. The thirteenth amendment had been adopted, but here was a wheel within a wheel, a nation within a nation, and it was considered desirable by those who controlled the Government at that time that we should have a specific agreement and understanding whereby these slaves should be emancipated. The second article of the treaty provides:

That the Choctaws and Chickasaws hereby covenant and agree that henceforth neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, otherwise than in punishment of crime whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted in accordance with laws applicable to all members of the particular nation, shall ever exist in said nations.

Then, having provided for the emancipation of the slaves, it made some provision respecting their care.

If the $300,000 was not a consideration for a greater title than the United States had before, why was provision for its payment put in there? Why was that sum named if there was not to be some further concession as respects the land between the ninety-eighth and the one hundredth meridian? I want Senators to tell me whether that was not applied to that land. It will not do to say that the $300,000, although the treaty states it was for the purpose of purchasing that land, was for another purpose. That would be arguing in a circle and would be disingenuous if persisted in.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] very justly says to me they had nothing but this that they could give. They were desolate. They had been in the rebellion for several years; their country had been devastated. They were nominally rich in some respects, but on their resources in the Treasury they had received no interest. Their houses and farms had been desolated, and they had nothing that they could give except, as the Senator from Connecticut says, the residuary, which was worth very little to them, and worth nothing until the time should come when the incursions of the whites should require that a different government should be set up in that territory.

The Senator from Colorado now asks me whether I believe that that conveyed such a title as would have justified the Government of the United States in opening that land to settlement and establishing its own autonomy over it. Standing alone I have no doubt of that; but there was not only this treaty, but other treaties standing in the way of opening up that land to white settlement. Therefore, when the Senator from Colorado asks me whether I think the Government of the United States could have done so, I answer him as respects this they could, but there were other things.

Mr. TELLER. I did not ask whether they could. I asked if it was the understanding that that was supposed to confer authority upon the United States. That is what I meant.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not dealing with that question; it is dealing with the title to the land. I want, if I can, to draw a distinction, and there certainly must be a distinction, between title to the land and the character of government that shall be placed over the people.

Mr. TELLER. The Government took this land with a title that prevented them from putting any but Indians on it. They now propose to change that, and the question is whether, if that be so, the Indians should not still be paid.

Mr. ALLISON. I will meet that question. I do not intend to omit saying what I think ought to be noticed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In that connection, as the Senator is going to discuss that point for a moment, I should like to say it is not threatened, but this land is occupied by white people. There are 25,000 white people now there. The Government has taken possession of it and given it out among the white people already.

Mr. ALLISON. Everybody knows that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Government will pay for it; that is all.

Mr. ALLISON. What I mean to say is, here is a title to this land without condition, and whatever arrangement we are to make with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations is not an arrangement about land west of the ninety-eighth meridian. That we have acquired and paid for. These treaties, taken by and large, not only with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, but with the Creeks and Seminoles and Cherokees, do provide, running all through them, that here is to be a government by Indians, and that white men, except in certain conditions, are not to interfere with them.

I have occupied too much time already, but as I have touched upon that point I want right here to say what I think should be done. These Indians have parted with their land, but the Government of the United States did promise them and the other tribes—the tribes are all as one as respects this question—that a white man's government should not be set up in that country. In this I may differ with some of my friends, but in my belief they are entitled to some consideration as respects this question; that is to say, they are entitled to be consulted and considered, not as respects this land at all, but as respects the general question whether the Indian Territory is to be wholly or partially controlled and governed under our laws and not under the laws of the Indian tribes. If so, what is the damage to these Choctaws? How have we injured them by changing our policy, which was not established but restated, reaffirmed, in 1866, not only as respects the Indian Territory but as respects the territory known as the Sioux Nation?

Mr. PLATT. I think that the Senator states the matter a little strongly when he says the Government promised these Indians that there should never be a white man's government set up within the limits of this leased district. I do not so understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do state it strongly, but—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They did agree to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean to state it so strongly that I can not be said at least to be doing anyone injustice.

Now, what is the damage to the Choctaws, for that is the question. There is not a Senator upon this floor who does not know that the policy of the Government of the United States has been changed in the last few years respecting the Indian Territory. There is not a Senator here who does not know that the policy has been changed at the instance and the request of Senators who reside in the Southwestern portion of the Union, and that the new policy has been adopted by gradual and irregular processes. I do not mean irregular in the sense of wrong processes, but I mean irregular in the sense that they have been going on by degrees, until I think it may be stated as the settled policy of this Government now that the Indian Territory is to be segregated and is to have a government of laws over its entirety. It may take some time to do that and probably will, and such a government is now over a portion of it.

Mr. STEWART. Is it claimed by the Indians that their property, the other land, depreciated in value by this cession, or is it claimed by them that the educational facilities are not as good as they would be if they were left to themselves.

Mr. ALLISON. So far as I have been able to discover I have not yet ascertained what their claim as respects that is. They have not claimed, as I understand, that they are damaged by this cession. I have not the exact figures here, but there are, according to the census of 1890, in round numbers about 4,000 Chickasaws and about 9,000 Choctaws in that Territory, and there are in the Choctaw country now 27,991 white men and in the Chickasaw country 49,000.

So, whatever may be their views, it is not the intrusion of white people that disturbs them, and therefore they are not damaged by having white people among them. They might be damaged, and I have no doubt they would be, by having a white government among them so far as the headmen are concerned, if what is reported here be true. Now, admitting that, and the Senator from Connecticut says I go too far, I think it is a question which we should reasonably and fairly consider with the Choctaws whether they are to be damaged, or have been, by the new policy which we propose.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will permit me, I will state just what I think was the condition under which this last conveyance or cession was made. I think both parties supposed that that land would always be used for an Indian government, but I do not think that the United States made any stipulation with the Indians that it would so use it. I think that was in contemplation of the parties.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not substantially differ from the Senator from Connecticut as respects that matter.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me just one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COKKRELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. In the line of what is stated by the Senator from Connecticut, and to show how well founded was the supposition which he says existed, I want to read a few lines from article 4 of the treaty of 1830:

The Government and the people of the United States are hereby obliged to secure to the said Choctaw Nation of red people the jurisdiction and government of all the persons and property that may be within their limits west, so that no Territory or State shall ever have a right to pass laws for the government of the Choctaw Nation of red people and their descendants—

I desire particularly to call the attention of the Senate to this—and that no part of the land granted them shall ever be embraced in any Territory or State.

Mr. ALLISON. That was in the treaty of 1830, but it was given up in the treaty of 1866, except, I think it may be fairly stated, that these people at that time had no idea that a white settler would go in there without the consent of the Indians or that a government similar to our autonomy would be established among them. I have no doubt that was understood, but I am drawing the distinction, and it must be drawn, between that and a title to the soil. They have sold their title to the soil, and we paid them for it, and we paid them under the circumstances a large sum for that.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire whether there is anything in that report or any other report showing any claim for damages or the character of the damages that would result from this different use of the land from what was generally supposed at the time?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like Senators to address the Chair, as I can not hear what is said. I want to keep the run of this debate, if I can.

Mr. STEWART. I want to know if there has been any claim set up for damages on account of the change of the policy of the United States, and if it is alluded to in any of these documents?

Mr. ALLISON. None that I know of. They claim a title to the land, and this appropriation is upon that basis. It is not that we are putting a white man's government there; it is not that a white settler is going there; it is that they have a title to this land which we must buy. I claim that they have no title which they can sell, because they have already sold it. Therefore, I agree that it is justice to the Government and people of the United States and to all these Indian tribes that we shall deal with them as respects the policy which we are now gradually intruding upon them of establishing another government within their territory.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator a question for information right there?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I have heard that the executive department has gone on and opened this very land to white settlement. Is that the fact?

Mr. ALLISON. It is, undoubtedly.

Mr. GEORGE. And that the territory thus settled is to be a part of the Territory of Oklahoma?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, a part of that Territory.

Mr. GEORGE. So that now, in contravention of the express pledged faith of the Government in the treaty of 1830, that part of the land conveyed is embraced in an organized Territory?

Mr. ALLISON. But that is not a question of importance here, because that is a question for us to consider with them as to the damages that will result from the establishment of this government over their territory.

Mr. GEORGE. But if the Senator will allow me; I do not desire to interrupt him unless it is agreeable to him—

Mr. ALLISON. That is all right. I have no objection to being interrupted.

Mr. GEORGE. I submit whether it is consistent with the pledged faith of the Government, and if it is not in direct violation of the stipulations which they made in the treaty of 1830, not being released from that, to put this land without the consent of the Choctaw Nation within the limits of an organized Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so understand it. On the contrary, I understand the fact to be that they are in absolute accord respecting this thing, and all they want is more money. They do not object to this Government of ours at all. They have made no protest against it.

Mr. GEORGE. They protest that you shall not violate the pledged faith of the Government contained in the treaty of 1830 unless you pay them for their rights in the Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. The Choctaws have no rights under the treaty of 1830. It is only the general understanding which hitherto prevailed, that a white man's government should not go in there without their consent. They have consented, and the Territory of Oklahoma is opened, and it is a question now as to how much if anything we ought to pay them on that account. So much as respects our obligations.

Now, I want to go back to the question of payment for a moment. When this appropriation was put upon the appropriation bill, it was put there with the understanding (and I believe the Indian Affairs Committee now states that to be the correct law on the subject) that the Cheyennes and Arapahoes should have an allotment within this area of all the lands that they were entitled to.

Mr. TELLER. They have already got that.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; and in making up the amount of this appropriation they made a deduction for 600 allottees. The allotments are nearly completed and 850 allottees have already settled upon this territory. So upon the ground of the appropriation itself, it is $50,000 more than it ought to be.

Mr. PLATT. Have all the settlements been made that are to be made?

Mr. ALLISON. Probably most of them have, but not quite all of them; enough, however, for my purpose. Therefore, upon the basis of the appropriation and the basis of this report there is $50,000 too much money here to be paid.

There are some curious things as respects this matter. I do not wish to animadvert upon those at great length. The only report, I repeat, that was ever made upon this subject is a report made by the Indian Affairs Committee of the other House, by Mr. PEEL, a member of the Indian Affairs Committee in the Fifty-first Congress, and now a member of that committee. Mr. PEEL in the Fifty-first Congress made a report on the 22d of September, 1890. It is a report quoting various things in extenso, and it then gives the deliberate judgment of the committee that the Choctaws and Chickasaws should have $1.05 per acre for this land, which is $500,000, in round numbers, less than this appropriation. So if any force or power is to be given to the House committee on this subject, it is that we appropriated nearly $600,000 too much last year.

I do not know that the Choctaws complain of that, because they have given their attorneys, or agreed to give them, the whole of this sum. So it comes out of the United States by this appropriation and not out of the Choctaw Nation. In other words, we have in the appropriation of last year paid a premium, which is to be paid to the attorneys, of nearly $600,000 more than the report of the House committee says they are entitled to receive.

Mr. PLATT. They proposed to deduct $300,000, did they not?

Mr. ALLISON. They proposed to deduct $300,000, and did in a sense deduct $800,000 in the 20 cents an acre. They did deduct the $300,000, but they made no account of the $800,000, because they said that the price should be $1.05 an acre.

Mr. PLATT. And this is $300,000 more?

Mr. ALLISON. Three hundred thousand dollars more than I have stated; in other words, $1.05 an acre and the $300,000. But I take it the $300,000 should be deducted from the whole area, not from this one appropriation, so that I have said nothing about it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As I do not care to refer to this matter in reply, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to one point. I never read the report of Mr. PEEL, and I did not know anything about this recommendation of $1.05, but after the Senator made the statement I looked to see the reason for it given, and the reason stated by the committee is that as the Creeks and Seminoles had been paid 20 cents, valuing the land at $1.25 an acre, the Government should pay the Choctaws and Chickasaws $1.05 an acre, and because the Government had paid other Indians $1.05 out of $1.25, they recommended that the Choctaws be paid a similar amount.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. That is what I was saying. I was saying that the deliberations of a committee of the House of Representatives, a coordinate body, upon which this action was based last year, proposed a sum which, when applied to the whole region west of the ninety-eighth meridian, is $1,500,000 less than the sum proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But that must have proceeded upon a mistaken idea that the Choctaws and Chickasaws had received 20 cents as well as the other Indians, which was not the fact.

Mr. ALLISON. No; there was no mistake whatever. They said, "We have not taken into account the $300,000, because we have reduced it to $1.05 an acre," and if they had allowed them $1.25 they would have deducted the $300,000.

Mr. STEWART. Let me ask the Senator how much is involved in this claim when carried out? How much will the claim amount to?

Mr. ALLISON. If the principle of this appropriation is carried out, the total of the claim will be over $9,000,000, and I do not know but that it will be over $10,000,000. I have not figured it up with absolute exactitude.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The total amount of land is a little over 6,000,000 acres outside of Greer County, and at $1.25 an acre the dollar and a half brings a clear profit of 25 cents an acre. Whether it is much or little the Government will make money out of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to that point. I should have forgotten it otherwise. The Senator says exclusive of Greer County it is 6,000,000 acres. There are in Greer County 1,511,000 acres, wherein we have a contest with the State of Texas as respects the boundary. The Senator from Alabama said a while ago in illustration that no State would ever get into a contest with the United States on a matter of boundary because of the great dignity and power of the United States.

The State of Texas has not hesitated to do that, and by agreement we have now a case in the Supreme Court of the United States, whereby we are contesting the lands in Greer County with the State of Texas. If the statement of the Senator be true, it is a great deal better for the United States to be relieved of this suit and let the State of Texas take the land, unless the Choctaws choose to take it. But two Senators in accord say that we are making a public sale of this land. I know this report takes great pains to show this. The Senator from Arkansas said we pay $1.50 an acre for the land within this territory.

Mr. PERKINS. And, if the Senator will permit a suggestion, for the very reason that Congress proposed to pay the Choctaws for the land.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very good statement; otherwise they would not charge anything for it, I understand.

Mr. PERKINS. Otherwise they would not charge so much. Otherwise they would have permitted settlers to take it.

Mr. ALLISON. In other words, we take 20 cents an acre or a certain sum an acre out of these settlers for the purpose of paying three men $600,000 who have put through a clause here on an appropriation bill for $2,990,000, and when this balance of the appropriation comes in I suppose another quarter of it will go to those three men, giving them nearly $2,000,000 for their services, while we are to pay an additional sum to the Choctaws in order that those men may secure one-quarter of it, because the committee who deliberated upon this matter said the Choctaws should have only $1.05 an acre.

Mr. President, I have gone over this question more in detail than I intended when I rose. I want to say what I think should be done. It has already been disclosed in debate that if we pay this sum we set a precedent for the payment of a further sum of $7,000,000, and we are just as much bound to pay that further sum of $7,000,000 as we are bound to pay this. What I think ought to be done is to have this whole matter recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that they be requested to bring forward here a proposition which will finally adjust all our relations with the Choctaws and Chickasaws as respects the territory west of 98° west longitude.

Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent to those who have examined this subject that we are to be committed to the payment of an unjust sum, a sum beyond what any committee has hitherto proposed to be paid for any lands similarly situated, taking their own construction of everything connected with these treaties as respects the Choctaws and Chickasaws. We have overpaid them, and the President of the United States, in my judgment, was wise in calling attention to the hasty legislation, because it was hasty legislation. It was legislation that was put through here without that deliberation as respects these questions which ought to be maintained with reference to a great subject like this.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations by what authority the President of the United States declines to execute a law, and I wish to further inquire, as he has waited one year and more, how much longer he can wait?

Mr. ALLISON. In response to the Senator from Colorado, I desire to say that I have never communicated with the President as respects this question. He has never mentioned it to me, nor have I mentioned it to him. I am not here for the purpose of expressing what the President ought to do or will do. He has spoken for himself.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] calls my attention to another point. It seems that this money was payable only when certain instruments or deeds or whatever were executed by these people.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Which they have offered to make persistently for twelve months past.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; they have offered to make them; but they have not made them to the satisfaction of the Executive. They are to be made to his satisfaction.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They have offered to make them in any form that he would dictate, and have asked him to suggest the form, and have asked it again and again.

Mr. ALLISON. The President says:

But as a duty was devolved upon me by the section quoted, viz: the acceptance and approval of the conveyances provided for, I have felt bound to look into the whole matter, and in view of the facts which I shall presently mention, to postpone any executive action until these facts could be submitted to Congress.

That is the President's own statement, and I put it in as a correct statement of his view of the case. Then he begins his argument, and the first point is that one-quarter of this sum is to go to three men.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will take the position that an improper distribution of this money by the Indians repeals a statute of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. There have been many occasions when we have repealed statutes.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, we have—

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly; there are cases where we asked the President not to execute the law. The statute books are full of such cases. So this message of the President is no extraordinary proceeding. Indeed, with the lights he had, and with the facts that were presented to him, and with the extraordinary claim which is made, it seems to me that he would have been derelict in his duty if he had not called the attention of Congress to this subject. That is what I think about it, and I have no hesitation in saying so.

I want to say that in my belief to pay these Choctaws and Chickasaws nine or ten million dollars—because that is what is involved in this claim; it is not the appropriation we have already made, but to pay them $10,000,000 for this vague, shadowy title which they claim to set up to these lands—is a payment that ought not to be made and that they ought not to demand of us.

All I ask is that this question shall be maturely considered and that we shall give the necessary authority here by legislation to somebody who will treat with these people upon a just, liberal, and equitable basis for whatever rights they have, and therefore I shall move before the end of this debate to recommit the question to the Committee on Indian Affairs in order that they may prepare some provision of this character.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, a little over one year ago the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, by large majorities in both Houses, made an appropriation in the Indian appropriation bill to pay the Chickasaws and Choctaws certain money for lands that they claimed a right in the leased district of that territory. It has been stated by the Indian commissioners and by everybody who has spoken on the subject up to the present Administration that the Government of the United States had no right to open those lands for white settlement until there was compensation given for the lands. Since the appropriation was made and approved by the President of the United States the payment has been suspended.

The Government of the United States has taken possession of the land that was proposed to be purchased and opened it to white settlement. It has been settled and is being sold to the settlers at $1.50 an acre. The Government is selling that land at $1.50 an acre, and now is undertaking not to pay its share of $1.25 to the Indians. If the Government did not want to pay these Indians $1.25 it is an outrage to them to charge the citizens $1.50 an acre. The $1.50 an acre was charged these people upon the ground that the Government had to pay the Indians for the land. That is the condition of this question.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator should state, I think, in order that there may be no wrong impression created, that the Government has paid to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes a large sum of money, which it is proposed—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, the enormous sum of 6 cents an acre.

Mr. PERKINS. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. PLATT. It paid a million and a half.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Connecticut can not be serious in that statement.

Mr. PLATT. The sum paid to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes was nearly a million and a half.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was a million and a half dollars for 5,000,000 acres of land that they held by treaty agreement known as the Cimarron tract in the Cherokee Outlet, and for the executive order reservation, amounting to 4,000,000 acres, 2,400,000 of which were south of the Canadian, as the Secretary of the Interior says, and I have a letter in my possession from him. The Cherokee Commission which negotiated this purchase stated that the consideration estimated for the entire executive order reservation was $250,000, leaving less than $150,000 as the consideration for these 2,400,000 acres of land, for which the large sum of 6 cents an acre has been paid by the Government—land that we are selling for a dollar and a half. If we had acted with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes as we propose to act with the Choctaws there would not have been anything paid for it at all.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has called the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are seventeen maps connected with the report that I had the honor to make from the Committee on Indian Affairs in this matter. The purpose of presenting those seventeen maps I shall state plainly. In 1819 a treaty was negotiated between John Quincy Adams and a Spaniard with an unpronounceable name, which was not ratified by either the Spanish Government or the American Government. The Spanish King refused absolutely to do anything with it. In October, 1820, the Government of the United States made a treaty with the Choctaw Indians, in which in specific terms they ceded all that tract of country lying south of the Arkansas River from a point which was considerably east of the present line up the Arkansas River, then up the Canadian to its source, down to the Red River, and down Red River to a point 3 miles below the mouth of Little River, and then to the point of beginning.

This territory was distinctly set out and it embraced lands that are shown on this map [indicating]. This is meridian 100 and this is 102. The one hundred and third meridian is further around; it can not quite be shown on the map. This embraces the land west of the one hundredth meridian [indicating] as certainly and specifically as it embraced the lands that are now occupied by the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

The treaty was ratified on the 18th day of October, 1820. On the 24th day of October, 1820, six days after the promulgation of the Choctaw treaty, the Spanish king signed a treaty that had been negotiated between the United States and Spain. On, I believe, the 19th of February following, the Senate of the United States ratified that treaty, and on the 23d it was promulgated and became the law of the land. Up to that time it had not been published, I presume. There is no evidence that it had been. It was a secret pending negotiation between Spain and the United States.

We, in the mean time, had conveyed this land as absolutely as the Government of the United States could convey it, to the Choctaw Nation. The line between the United States and Spain as fixed by the Spanish treaty was this meridian of 100, and the Government of the United States being a sovereign power treating with a sovereign power had the right to alienate the territory lying west of the one hundredth meridian; and having alienated it, of course the Choctaws were ousted of their possession to that country.

But what I want the Senate to bear in mind distinctly is that the Government had by treaty conveyed this land first, and while it had a good right to it, to the Choctaw Nation. The purpose of the maps was to show that there is no doubt about that land belonging to the United States when it was conveyed to the Choctaw Indians.

The seventeen maps, printed in London, in Amsterdam, in Paris, maps by all the civilized nations of Europe, all show that the western line of Louisiana was understood to be the Rio Grande, up to the meridian of 103° and from there north. There is not a solitary map among the old maps in the Library that I have been able to find, and I have gone over them as carefully as I could, except one that does not show that to be the fact, and that one is dated 1820 after the treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws was made. That map was made by an Englishman and it claimed that the Sabine was the line, and it is the only map that does. There are a number of other maps in addition to these; but I traced these eighteen maps over with my own hands, after they had been previously made, to see that they were correct, and surely, except the one I state, I have not been able to find any of those old maps but shows there was a distinct understanding that Louisiana went to the Rio Grande.

Senators know perfectly well that La Salle discovered Matagorda in 1683. He was subsequently killed, and from the time of his settlement in Matagorda Bay, which took place in 1685, up to the time when France ceded this country to Spain, the Rio Grande was considered the boundary between the Spanish and the French possessions. In 1762 France conveyed all this country to Spain. In 1800 Spain ceded it to France, and in 1803 France ceded it to the United States. In those treaties the Rio Grande was considered the boundary, and Louisiana was referred to as the ancient possession held by France in the territory of Louisiana.

All this shows that the Government of the United States did have a title to this land when by treaty she conveyed it to the Choctaws. The purpose was simply this. In 1855 in a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Choctaw Nation, which has been referred to by the Senator from Iowa, $800,000 was stipulated to be paid to the Choctaw Indians for a release of whatever claim they had west of the meridian of 100° and to release the country they had lying between the ninety-eighth meridian and meridian 100°. It was the purchase of whatever claim they had west of the one hundredth meridian and the lease of the territory east of the one hundredth and west of the ninety-eighth. There was no apportionment of that $800,000. Nobody can undertake to say how much of that was intended to be paid for the lease of this district or how much of it was to be paid for the purchase of the relinquishment west of the one hundredth meridian.

If the Choctaws had a right to claim damages for a failure of title solemnly conveyed to them by the Government of the United States, and that land was worth 12 cents an acre, it would take more than the $800,000 to pay for that failure of title in that tract of land, and would leave absolutely nothing for the lease of the district between 98° and 100°. I did not present the alternative in the report, but suppose you say that the whole $800,000 was applied to the lease of the district between 98° and 100°, the Government held it for a number of years under that lease, and it would not amount to more than a cent or so an acre as the pay for the lease during the time the Government held it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator without his consent—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator speaks of this as a lease. Of course it was a cession of this land to be settled by other Indians, and it went on forever.

Mr. PERKINS. But, if the Senator from Iowa will permit a suggestion, in the treaty of 1855 the Choctaws and Chickasaws reserved the right to themselves to live in this leased district and to occupy it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was described in the treaty as a lease. It was called a lease. They had a right to put certain Indians on it, not any Indians, not all Indians. They had a right to put the Osages, the Kiowas, and other affiliated tribes of that sort, but they were especially excluded from the right of putting New Mexican Indians or putting Indians from north of the Arkansas River. They had no right to put any other Indians there. It was with this limitation. They leased it with the right to put there certain tribes that came from their own neighborhood, and that was done.

Now, if you apply the $800,000 either to the extinguishment of the title of the territory west of 100°, or if you apply it to the lease between 98° and 100°, either one would consume the whole $800,000, without there being any unreasonable trade made. This was the purpose I had in presenting these maps, and it was the sole purpose simply to show that a large part of this $800,000 was not used, as was suggested in the message of the President of the United States, for the purpose of extinguishing the title to the leased district.

Mr. GEORGE. The fact was that the $800,000 was given both for the cession of the land west of the one hundredth meridian and for the lease, without any apportionment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is specifically so stated in the lease: there was no apportionment, and no suggestion of an apportionment.

Mr. GEORGE. How much land was west of the one hundredth meridian?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Seven or eight million acres.

Mr. PLATT. About 6,000,000 acres, were there not?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not remember the exact quantity, but I think it was something over 7,000,000 acres.

Mr. ALLISON. Seven million seven hundred and thirty-one thousand acres, including Greer County.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. West of 100°?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; west of 100°.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There were 6,589,000 acres west of the one hundredth meridian. There were 10,296 square miles in it, as I think is stated by the President in some of the exhibits that accompany his message.

Mr. GEORGE. Is Greer County west of the one hundredth meridian?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No; Greer County is east of the one hundredth meridian, and the tract of country known as the leased district lies between 98° and 100°. The Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation, consisting of 2,400,000 acres, was a part of that. The Kiowa and Comanche Reservation was another part of it, amounting to 2,968,000 acres, and Wichita Reservation was another part, making 743,000 acres. Greer County composes the entire leased district, as it was called.

The Government leased this tract of land at the time it purchased a relinquishment of whatever right the Choctaws had west of 100° in the year 1855, and $800,000 was paid as the consideration of both the lease and the relinquishment.

I shall not undertake to go into the details of this matter very fully for two reasons. One is, I should be very glad indeed to have a vote if it is possible to have it to-day, and another is that there are so few Senators present paying attention to this discussion that I feel like it would be a waste of time.

In 1866 the Government made a treaty with these Indians which has been assumed as the basis of this claim. The Senator from Iowa read a part of article 3 of the treaty of 1866, and upon a part of the language in that section the claim is based that the Chickasaws and Choctaws have released the title they had to the leased district.

I have neglected up to this time to mention a fact in addition to a conveyance by a treaty of all the land embraced between the Canadian and the Red Rivers as far as the meridian of 103°; but I will read this article:

ARTICLE 3. The Choctaws and Chickasaws, in consideration of the sum of $300,000, hereby cede to the United States the territory west of the ninety-eighth degree west longitude, known as the leased district, provided that the said sum shall be invested and held by the United States, at an interest not less than 5 per cent., in trust for the said nations, until the Legislatures of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, respectively, shall have made such laws, rules, and regulations as may be necessary to give all persons of African descent, resident in the said nations at the date of the treaty of Fort Smith, and their descendants, heretofore held in slavery among said nations, all the rights, privileges, and immunities, including the right of suffrage of citizens of said nations, except in the annuities, moneys, and public domain claimed by, or belonging to said nations respectively; and also to give to such persons, who were residents as aforesaid, and their descendants 40 acres each of the land of said nations on the same terms as the Choctaws and Chickasaws, to be selected on the survey of said land after the Choctaws and Chickasaws and Kansas Indians have made their selections, as herein provided; and immediately on the enactment of such laws, rules, and regulations, the said sum of $300,000 shall be paid to the said Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in the proportion of three-fourths to the former and one-fourth to the latter—less such sum, at the rate of $100 per capita, as shall be sufficient to pay such persons of African descent before referred to as within ninety days after the passage of such laws, rules, and regulations shall elect to remove and actually remove from the said nations respectively. And should the said laws, rules, and regulations not be made by the Legislatures of the said nations, respectively, within two years from the ratification of this treaty, then the said sum of $300,000 shall cease to be held in trust for the said Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and be held for the use and benefit of such of said persons of African descent as the United States shall remove from the said Territory in such manner as the United States shall deem proper, the United States agreeing, within ninety days from the expiration of the said two years, to remove from said nations all such persons of African descent as may be willing to remove; those remaining or returning after having been removed from said nations to have no benefit of said sum of $300,000, or any part thereof, but shall be upon the same footing as other citizens of the United States in the said nations.

The argument was made by the Senator from Iowa that this $300,000 which was stipulated here to be paid to the Chickasaws and Choctaws was a consideration for the transfer of the leased district to the United States. This can not be claimed by any man who will read the language of this article 3 of the treaty. The first words in the treaty say that this land is ceded to the Government of the United States in consideration of $300,000, but in the same article the statement is distinctly made that if these Indians, estimated at 3,000 at the time in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, shall remove to the leased district, the money shall be paid to them, $100 a head, and if the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations do not pass such laws as will entitle these negroes to citizenship within the specified time of two years, then this money is to remain and be the money of the United States.

It is perfectly plain, then, that the $300,000 was paid not for the land, but it was paid, first, if the Indians gave the negroes the right of citizenship. It was paid for giving them that right, $100 a head, carrying 40 acres of land apiece. If they did not admit them to the rights of citizenship, then, the money was to be paid to the negroes in case they went into the leased district, and if they did not go it was to be the property of the United States. The Indians did not get it all, except upon the condition that they were to make these negroes citizens and give them the stipulated 40 acres of land, each. So there was not one solitary subject of consideration in the $300,000 for the conveyance of this land to the United States Government. All this goes in the same article. It is taken in connection with it and must be considered as a part of the language that says there was a cession.

The Senator from Iowa does not question the fact that there is something due these people. The Government of the United States in 1818, when it owned this country, by a solemn treaty stipulation conveyed every foot of this land to these Indians. In 1842 it executed a patent to the Indians for greater security and to satisfy them in their clamors. Now, the claim is, that by the treaty of 1866 7,713,000 acres of land were conveyed to the Government of the United States for the paltry consideration of $300,000.

The Senator from Iowa felt the weakness of this statement, that while we were paying the Creeks over $900,000 for a partial interest in 2,000,000 acres of land, while we paid the Seminoles a considerable amount of money for a much smaller tract of land, it was utterly preposterous to talk about conveying 7,000,000 acres of land to the Government of the United States for $300,000. For that reason he went back and took up the history of affairs before the war. He said these people had forfeited all their rights; and so they had. I forfeited my life at the same time.

The Government of the United States had the right to prosecute me for levying war against the United States, and under the laws of the land I would have been considered a traitor, perhaps, if I had been brought up to be tried. But I was not tried: the law was not enforced against me. The laws of forfeiture were not enforced against these Indians, but, on the contrary, the delegation that was sent by the Government of the United States down to Fort Smith to treat with the Chickasaws and Choctaws set it out as one of the conditions of the treaty in 1866 that they should be restored to all of their ancient rights. So it does not enter into this argument that some of these people had engaged in war. It makes no difference that a part of them were on one side and a part on the other side.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will permit a suggestion, some of them were loyal to the Government of the United States and served in the United States Army.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly they were, from all these tribes. There were men from this tribe loyal to the Government of the United States. Some of them were in the Confederate service, but that fact cuts no figure in this matter. These people owned this land, it was conveyed to them by treaty, and had been conveyed to them by patent, and this conveyance by them to the United States at best is a mere implication, a mere statement of a part of what article 3 means.

In 1865 the Government made treaties with all of what are known as the civilized tribes in this tract of country, the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Choctaws, and Chickasaws.

Mr. PERKINS. In 1866.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The treaties were negotiated in 1865 and ratified in 1866. All of these tribes owned a tract of unoccupied country west of their reservation where they lived, and each one of them conveyed to the Government of the United States this western country. In the Creek treaty this language was used:

ART. 3. In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Creeks hereby cede and convey to the United States, to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon, the west half of their entire domain.

In the Seminole treaty the following language occurs:

ARTICLE 3. In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Seminoles cede and convey to the United States their entire domain, being, etc.

The Chickasaw and Choctaw treaty, the one under which this claim originates, is as follows:

ARTICLE 3. The Choctaws and Chickasaws, in consideration of the sum of $300,000, hereby cede to the United States the territory west of the ninety-eighth degree west longitude.

The language in each treaty is about the same. The language in each would be sufficient to carry the estate in the land absolutely. Reports have been made by Commissioners of Indian Affairs, by Presidents, and by Secretaries of the Interior from the time of the negotiation of this treaty up to the present Administration, and there has never been a claim made on the part of any of those officers that the Government of the United States had a right to open this land to white settlement. On the contrary, it has been distinctly held again and again that the Government of the United States could not open this land for white settlement without further negotiations with the Indians. The Creeks and the Seminoles two or three years ago—I do not remember the exact date—were paid for their land.

Mr. PERKINS. In 1889.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In 1889, the Senator from Kansas suggests, the Creeks and Seminoles were paid for their land, on the basis of a dollar and a quarter an acre. Each of these tribes had had certain parts of their money paid to them, and the remainder, enough to make the consideration a dollar and a quarter an acre, was added to it and was paid to these people. The Chickasaws and Choctaws have exactly the same claim that those people had. There is no difference then between them. As to the Chickasaws and Choctaws, there was a distinct understanding—a specific agreement—made between them and the Government of the United States, that this land should be held for Indian settlement and for Indian settlement alone. In the report which I had the honor to submit on the part of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have set out the conditions upon which they were required by agents of the Government at Fort Smith to treat. If I can lay my hand on that I will call the attention of the Senate to those conditions.

Mr. PLATT. I can furnish the volume to the Senator, if he desires.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Connecticut has kindly furnished me the matter I wish to read. There were seven conditions set out upon which the Government proposed to treat with these Indians, and they were notified that they must accede to those propositions before any negotiations would be entered into. Without reading the first four, I will read the fifth.

Fifth. A part of the Indian country to be set apart to be purchased for the use of such Indians from Kansas, or elsewhere, as the Government may desire to colonize thereon.

Sixth. That the policy of the Government to unite all the Indian tribes of this region into one consolidated government should be accepted.

Seventh. That no white person, except Government employés or officers, or employes of internal improvement companies authorized by Government, will be permitted to reside in the country unless incorporated with the several nations.

Those were the conditions set out when the Indians were called together at Fort Smith for the purpose of negotiating these treaties.

Mr. GEORGE. There is one point I desire to have explained. I do not know whether I have it right or not.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator let me finish this statement before he begins?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. All of these conditions were acceded to by the Indians formally and in terms, as the records of the Indian Office show, except the seventh one. They proposed a modification of that. They proposed to change it in some respects, but the agents of the Government were firm in their resolution to insist that they should comply with the demands of the Government, and they were compelled at last to yield adhesion to each one of these provisions, and by these provisions the stipulation was made that this land should be devoted to Indian uses, and should not be used by the Government for the purposes of white settlement. Now I will hear what the Senator from Mississippi wishes to say.

Mr. GEORGE. What I desire to know is this: These propositions were submitted by the commissioners of the United States, one of whom was the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to a convention called by the United States officers, composed of the leading men of all the various Indian tribes with whom they proposed to treat. Is that the fact about it?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the fact.

Mr. GEORGE. So when the United States entered into these treaties in 1866 the first step taken was the calling of a convention of the headmen, chiefs and mingoes of all the various tribes in that country, and submitting to them in writing the seven distinct propositions to which the Senator has alluded.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not know whether the Indians called to Fort Smith for the purpose of making this negotiation could properly be called a convention. They were the leading men, delegates from all the five tribes, assembled at Fort Smith for that purpose, representing their nations, and the very inception of the negotiation was the presenting of these seven conditions to which they must assent before negotiations would be entered into.

Mr. GEORGE. Presented to all alike?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. To all alike.

Mr. MORGAN. But in this report the Secretary of the Interior calls it a council. He says:

The council assembled at Fort Smith September 8, and delegates were present in the course of the sittings (though not all in attendance at first) representing the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Seminoles, Osages, Senecas, Shawnees, Quapaws, Wyandotts, Wichitas, and Comanches.

Mr. GEORGE. So in the negotiation of these various treaties, including the treaty about which we are now having the controversy here, the treaty of 1866 between the United States and the Choctaws, the first initial step taken was the calling together of all the various tribes and delegates and making these seven propositions to all of them together. Is that the fact?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. They were presented as the basis of the negotiation which they were to make?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As the sole basis.

Mr. GEORGE. That is a very important fact in the matter.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They were told that they would not be treated with except upon their assenting to all seven of these propositions.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, we understand how the treaty was made. The United States draws up the terms and says, "Now you take this or something else will happen."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Article 3 of this treaty was made in view of these seven stipulations on the part of the Government, and it makes no difference whether the words are recited in article 3 of the treaty that the land should be reserved for white settlement, I contend that in honesty and all good conscience the conditions set out in these seven articles are just as binding and as much a part of that treaty as if they had been written in the body of it. The United States especially can not be heard to deny that these were conditions upon which this treaty was negotiated, because it imperatively demanded that they should be assented to before the treaty would be negotiated at all.

This has been so understood by all the officers of the Government from the time this was done until now. I have in my hand selections from a number of reports by different Secretaries of the Interior, all covering the same point. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in reading at any length from these reports.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator read enough to show the purport and state the chronological order in which they come?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, I will state that Secretary Schurz used this language in 1879, in speaking of this very question:

The title acquired by the Government by the treaties of 1866 was secured in pursuance and furtherance of the same purpose of Indian settlement which was the foundation of the original scheme. That purpose was the removal of Indian tribes from the limits of the political State and Territorial organizations and their permanent location upon other lands sufficient for the needs of each tribe. These lands being ample in area for the purpose, it has become a settled policy to locate other tribes thereon as fast as arrangements can be made, and provisions have been constantly made by treaties, agreements, and acts of Congress to effect these objects.

That purpose is expressly declared in the said treaties. The cessions of the Creeks and Seminoles are stated to have been made "in compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon." These words must be held to create a trust equivalent to what would have been imposed had the language been "for the purpose of locating Indians and freedmen thereon."

The lands ceded by the Choctaws and Chickasaws were by article 9 of the treaty of June 22, 1855, leased "to the United States * * * for the permanent settlement of the Wichita and such other tribes or bands of Indians as the Government may desire to locate thereon."

The treaty of 1866—

The Secretary goes on to say, and this is very important:

The treaty of 1866 substituted a direct purchase for the lease, but did not extinguish or alter the trust. In 1867 the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches were settled upon these lands by treaty.

And much more of the same character. Further on Secretary Schurz says:

The whole Indian Territory has been regarded as Indian country, subject to no State or Territorial laws, and excepted from judicial process, except under special enactments provided for a limited and restricted jurisdiction.

Mr. Holcomb, who I believe was Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1881, in speaking of this subject, uses this language:

The lands reconveyed to the United States by the foregoing treaties are therefore held subject to the trust named. They can be appropriated only to the uses specified, and to those uses only by the United States, and then only in the manner provided for by law. Miscellaneous immigration, even by the intended beneficiaries, would be unauthorized and illegal.

Again and again have these assertions been made by Secretaries of the Interior, Commissioners of Indian Affairs, and by Presidents, and it is left for this Administration to be the first to deny that these conditions apply as well to the lands of the Chickasaws and Choctaws as they apply to the lands of the Cherokees, the Creeks, and the Seminoles.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I understood the Senator aright, but if I did I desire to emphasize the point. Was the consensus of opinion and the practice by the Indian Department of the Government entirely consistent with the statement read from the report made by Mr. Schurz? Was there no variation in that until the present Administration?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Not an instance, so far as I am aware. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] knows of one, I should be obliged to him to let me know it. These Secretaries, and Commissioners, and Presidents, whenever the question has been raised, have held that this Government held the land of these people for a specific purpose, and as this Commissioner uses the language very strongly, I will read it again for the benefit of the Senator from Iowa. I do not believe he was in when I read it just now.

Mr. ALLISON. I was in, but I should like to hear it again.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Commissioner says:

The lands reconveyed to the United States by the foregoing treaties are therefore held subject to the trust named. They can be appropriated only to the uses specified, and to those uses only by the United States, and then only in the manner provided for by law. Miscellaneous immigration even by the intended beneficiaries would be unauthorized and illegal.

Mr. PLATT. From whom does the Senator read?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I was reading an extract from Mr. Holcomb. I am reading a quotation from the letter of Mr. Belt, the present Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs and at that time the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in a letter addressed by him to the Secretary of the Interior, dated September 13, 1890, and printed in the report of Mr. PEEL on this Choctaw and Chickasaw bill some time in the latter part of 1890. I do not remember the exact date.

While I think of it, for fear I may forget it, the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs has reported distinctly in favor of the claim of these people. This explanation I ought to make, I ought to say to the Senator from Mississippi, in justice to the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that he has followed the line of the other Commissioners and the Secretaries of the Interior and all the administrations up to this time, and he has not made any ruling contrary to what has been herein set down.

Mr. GEORGE. The Indian Department?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I am reading this letter from a report of Mr. Belt, the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, made during this Administration, less than two years ago.

Mr. GEORGE. And in the same line with the others?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Just what I have read.

The Choctaw and Chickasaw cession of April 28, 1866 (14 Stats., 769), was by the tenth section thereof made subject to the conditions of the compact of June 22, 1855 (11 Stats., 613), by the ninth article of which it was stipulated that the lands should be appropriated for the permanent settlement of such tribes or bands of Indians as the United States might desire to locate thereon.

The lands embraced in the Choctaw and Chickasaw cession were also included in a definite district established by the stipulations of the treaty of 1855, pursuant to the act of Congress of May 28, 1830, the United States reneging by the seventh article of said treaty to remove and keep out from that district all intruders.

Mr. PLATT. I think that shows just how much value may be attached to Mr. Holcomb's statement in relation to this matter. I do not understand that it is true that by the seventh article of the treaty there was any stipulation to keep the intruders out of the leased district, the Chickasaw district, which has been opened.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not understand the Senator's point.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Holcomb says:

The lands embraced in the Choctaw and Chickasaw cession were also included in a definite district established by the stipulations of the treaty of 1855, pursuant to the act of Congress of May 28, 1830, the United States reneging by the seventh article of said treaty to remove and keep out from that district all intruders.

They meant that to apply to this leased district. The seventh article does not apply to these lands at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It applies to the whole Choctaw country.

Mr. PLATT. It applies precisely to the Chickasaw district. Mr. JONES of Arkansas. To the whole Choctaw country.

Mr. PLATT. Not at all; it applies to the Chickasaw district. The Choctaw country is bounded as described in that treaty.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was no Chickasaw district in 1830. The Chickasaw district was made in 1837.

Mr. PLATT. We shall see.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], when he was Secretary of the Interior, ruled on this question:

In a letter of Secretary Teller to the President pro tempore of the Senate, dated February 4, 1884, replying to a resolution on the subject, his views were expressed with general reference to the lands in the Indian Territory, as follows:

"None of the land or general laws of the United States have been extended to any part of the Indian Territory, except as to crimes and punishments and other provisions regulated by the intercourse acts."

"This being the case, no portion of the lands within the Indian Territory is subject to entry under the land laws of the United States, and no portion can be made subject to such entry by the action of the Executive in the present status of said lands."

Mr. President, there Secretary Teller, who was Secretary of the Interior at the time and a man who distinguished himself as an executive officer when he held that position as being absolutely fair towards the Indian wards of the Government and just in looking after the interests of the Government of the United States at the same time, after careful examination, after full investigation, distinctly held that the Government of the United States could not open this land to settlement, except, to use his own language, "in the present status of said lands."

Now, there is practically no change in the status of these lands that have been just now opened by the Government of the United States to settlement, except the promise, solemnly made by both branches of the legislative department of the Government, that these lands should be paid for.

The Choctaws made no protest, as the Senator suggested a while ago, against the opening of these lands. They did not open their mouths because they believed when the Government of the United States appropriated the money to pay them, that the Government would keep its word and pay its debt, and there was no question about protesting against the opening of the lands, and the Government inducing the people to occupy them until they had paid for them, because they were bound by treaty obligations during all the years past that nothing of that kind should be done, and yet they have done it and have taken possession of the lands, and they have taken them at $1.25 an acre, while they are selling them at this time at $1.50 an acre, and have refused up to this time to pay the Indians the $1.25 an acre they were entitled to have for them.

Those lands—

Says Mr. Secretary Teller—

were acquired by treaties with the various Indian nations or tribes in that Territory in 1866, to be held for Indian purposes and to some extent for the settlement of the former slaves of some of said nations on portions thereof.

Such are the purposes for which said lands are now being used or held according to the common understanding of the objects of treaties by which they were acquired, and from these arise the necessity for or obligation to keep said lands in their present condition of occupancy or otherwise.

A consensus of those views is expressed in the letter of President Arthur, of January 27, 1885, transmitting a reply to Senate resolution wherein he states that "Until the existing status of these lands shall have been changed by agreement with the Indians interested or in some other manner, as may be determined by Congress, the treaties heretofore made with the Indians should be maintained, and the power of the Government to the extent necessary should be exercised to keep off intruders and all unauthorized persons."

Mr. GEORGE. Whose language is that?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. President Arthur's. He states that as the consensus of the opinions of those who had gone before him in managing this matter. Mr. Assistant Commissioner Belt—I dislike to trespass on the patience of the Senate so long, but this matter is lengthy—Mr. Belt says:

The courts, however, have laid down certain rules for the construction of Indian treaties, and no reason is found for not applying those rules in the consideration of this case.

He says:

In Worcester against the State of Georgia (6 Peters, 515) the United States Supreme Court held that "the language used in treaties with the Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. If words be made use of which are susceptible of more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of the treaty they should be construed as used only in the latter sense. * * * How the words of the treaty were understood by these unlettered people rather than their critical meaning should form the rule of construction." And in United States against Kagama (118 U. S., 375) the court said:

"These Indian tribes are the wards of the United States; they are communities dependent on the United States; dependent largely for their daily food, dependent for their political right. * * * From their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises a duty of protection, and with it in the power. This has always been recognized by the Executive and by courts, and by this court whenever the question has arisen." Then in the case of the Kansas Indians (5 Wallace, 737) the court declared that "rules of interpretation favorable to the Indian tribes are to be adopted in construing our treaties with them."

In determining the extent of the title received by the United States from these Indians—

In this Mr. Belt is discussing exactly the title we got under article 3 of the treaty of 1866, which the Senator from Iowa says conveys an absolute title without leaving a vestige in these Indians. Mr. Belt says:

In determining the extent of the title received by the United States from these Indians by the cession made in the third article of the treaty of 1866, it will be necessary to ascertain definitely what the Indians understood they were at that time parting with. To do this, reference is had to the condition of the Indians and the purposes of the Government, at the time that this treaty was made, with regard to these lands. The records of this office show that in 1865 a commission was appointed to negotiate with the Indians of the then Southern Superintendency, among them the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees, for the establishment of peace, all of those nations having to a more or less degree been guilty of a violation of their treaties with the United States prior to the war by their association and affiliation with the forces of the so-called Confederate States, and to make new treaties with these Indians by which they would again come under the protection of the United States.

A council was held between this commission and representatives of the southern Indians at Fort Smith, Ark., in September, 1865, beginning on the 8th and ending on the 21st day of that month. On the 9th of September, 1865, the president of the commission, Hon. D. N. Cooley, who was also at that time Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed the council, in which he named the different nations and tribes who had violated their treaties by making treaties with the government of the so-called Confederate States, as follows:

The Creek Nation, July 10, 1861; Choctaws and Chickasaws, July 12, 1861; Seminoles, August 1, 1861; Shawnees, Delawares, Wichitas, and affiliated tribes, August 12, 1861; the Comanches of the prairie, August 12, 1861; Great Osages, October 2, 1861; the Senecas and Shawnees, October 4, 1861; Quapaws, October 4, 1861; and the Cherokees, October 7, 1861; and declared that the President of the United States was anxious to renew the relations with these Indians which existed prior to the war; that as the representatives of the President of the United States, the commission, for which he spoke, was empowered to enter into new treaties with the proper delegates of the tribes located within the Indian Territory, and others above named, living west and north of Indian Territory; that such treaties must contain substantially the following stipulations, viz:

Then those seven conditions of which I have just now spoken were set out. Later on the Assistant Commissioner says:

It is possible that the commission, when it came to negotiate with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, may have omitted from the treaty with those Indians a similar condition and reservation regarding the purposes for which the lands were to be used, because of the fact that the United States had secured by a prior treaty a lease, which amounted to a permanent lease, of the lands in question for Indian purposes, for which, together with other considerations, it had paid the sum of $800,000. Considering this fact, the commission negotiating the treaty may have considered the payment of the $800,000 additional, as provided for in the treaty of 1866, as sufficient compensation for an absolute cession of all right, title, and interest that the Choctaws and Chickasaws had in and to the said "leased districts." This conclusion, however—

The Commissioner says:

This conclusion, however, can not be fairly reached when the record of the negotiations is fully considered, for we have already seen that these Indians accepted the terms proposed by the commission, upon which the treaties would be negotiated; and these very terms indicate the purpose for which the ceded lands were to be used. And it shows quite clearly that the Indians understood that they were parting with whatever right, title, and interest remained to them in the "leased district" to the United States to be used for the location and settlement of other Indians thereon.

I will say, Mr. President, that not only the Indians understood it so, but the commissioners who negotiated this trade understood it so; all the executive officers of the Government understood it so; the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs so understands it, the only exception I know of being the present Secretary of the Interior and perhaps the President of the United States. There is much more of this, but it is unnecessary to present it.

The Senator from Iowa in the course of his remarks indulged in some reminiscences about some experiences the Choctaws had had with this Government heretofore. To show how vigilant they have been in presenting whatever claims they have, he says that after their lands had been sold in Mississippi the Choctaws claimed that they were entitled to the net proceeds of certain land sales, that they urged the matter in Congress, and at last agreed to leave it to the Senate of the United States to determine whether or not they were entitled to anything, and that the Senate of the United States did determine it. I called the Senator's attention to the fact when he made the statement, that after the Senate of the United States had solemnly paid that this money was due to these people, it was thirty years before they were able to get the money out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Thirty years or thirteen?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was thirty years before they got the money after the Senate had solemnly adjudged that they were entitled to it; after they had intrusted to the Senate of the United States the arbitration of their claim and after the Senate of the United States had found in their favor, for over thirty years they were denied the use of the money. They were finally allowed to go before the Court of Claims and bring a suit. They brought it, and then they were compelled to go to the Supreme Court of the United States, and at last, after that court rendered a judgment in their favor, it took three or four years more for them to get the money.

Mr. GEORGE. How was that done?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. By a distinct agreement with them.

Mr. GEORGE. By a treaty?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. An agreement with the Choctaws. I do not know whether it was a treaty or whether it was simply an agreement.

Now, I want to read just a page from that decision, because the Senator from Iowa has brought it in, and he will find what the Supreme Court believes about some of these things:

As was said by this court recently in the case of the United States against Kagama (118 U. S., 375, 383): "These Indian tribes are the wards of the nation; they are communities dependent on the United States; dependent largely for their daily food; dependent for their political rights. They owe no allegiance to the States and receive from them no protection; because of the local ill-feeling, the people of the States where they are found are often their deadliest enemies. From their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them, and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises the duty of protection, and with it the power. This has always been recognized by the Executive, by Congress, and by this court, whenever the question has arisen."

In that connection I will digress for just a moment. The Senator criticised the agreement on the part of these people to pay 25 per cent of the proceeds of their claim to certain attorneys who had come here to present their claims. Does any Senator here have the slightest idea that these Indians would ever have agreed to pay 25, or 10, or even 5 per cent if they had ever been the recipients of anything like fair treatment by the United States Government? On the contrary, the reason they agreed to pay this exorbitant fee was that these people should defray all the expenses of prosecuting the claim, that they should incur all the risks involved in it, and, if they failed to recover, they were themselves to be the losers of their own time, their own money, and everything else in connection with it. The Government of the United States ought to be the last party to complain of these people for paying an exorbitant fee to attempt to get money due them from the United States, because, as I have just shown you, the Supreme Court of the United States itself criticised the conduct of the Government towards these people in this case. As I have shown, they were thirty years in getting the money after the Senate had solemnly awarded it to them.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator state what fee was paid?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They paid their attorneys 30 per cent, but they were compelled to incur the expense of coming to this city, of living here for years. Agent after agent died here, and others were sent in their place. Mr. Pitchlyn came here, lived here for years, and died here in actual poverty. Agent after agent of that nation was sent here, spent their money and time here; many had squandered their fortunes, and died without being able to get anything from the United States.

When at last the claim was adjudicated, the attorneys' fees were paid, 30 per cent, which was to be distributed among the different attorneys. One of the parties connected with it told me that the expenses of the prosecution of this claim had amounted to nearly the total sum of the claim before they got the money. Men who had put their money in the claims were never reimbursed and never made whole, although they got 30 per cent. There was more besides paid to other persons connected with the prosecution of the claim.

Mr. GEORGE. Was there any interest paid on it?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No interest was paid until after the judgment of the Supreme Court. The Government had the use of the money for thirty years and paid the Indians no interest, and they had to pay 30 per cent of the amount to secure it from the Government at last.

But to continue reading from this decision:

It had accordingly been said in the case of Worcester vs. The State of Georgia (6 Peters, 582): "The language used in treaties with the Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. If words be made use of which are susceptible of a more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of the treaty, they should be considered as used only in the latter sense. * * * How the words of the treaty were understood by this unlettered people, rather than their critical meaning, should form the rule of construction."

The recognized relation between the parties to this controversy, therefore, is that between a superior and an inferior, whereby the latter is placed under the care and control of the former, and which, while it authorizes the adoption on the part of the United States of such policy as their own public interests may dictate, recognizes, on the other hand, such an interpretation of their acts and promises as justice and reason demand in all cases where power is exerted by the strong over those to whom they owe care and protection. The parties are not on an equal footing, and that inequality is to be made good by the superior justice which looks only to the substance of the right, without regard to technical rules framed under a system of municipal jurisprudence, formulating the rights and obligations of private persons, equally subject to the same laws.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States can not claim that it lives up to the doctrine, as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, as to its duty. I beg leave to read the decision again. I think gentlemen who have made up their minds that, no matter what the circumstances may be they will prevent, if possible the payment of this money to these Choctaws, ought not to listen to it:

The parties are not on an equal footing, and that inequality is to be made good by the superior justice which looks only to the substance of the right without regard to technical rules framed under a system of municipal jurisprudence, formulating the rights and obligations of private persons, equally subject to the same laws.

Yet in this case, talking of technical rules, I will digress to speak of that. This appropriation provides for the payment for certain lands in the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation now occupied by the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. It is repeated twice in the clause making the appropriation, and yet when the President of the United States was debating about the form of deed that was to be given by the Choctaws and Chickasaws, the Secretary of the Interior advised him to require that these people should make a deed not for the land that is embraced now in the occupation of the Cheyenne and Arapahoes, but that he should require to be embraced in it the lands that were set out in the executive order as it was made in 1869 as to the reservation, and which embraced not only the 2,400,000 acres that we have appropriated in money to pay for, and which we propose to pay for, but included, in addition to that, 743,000 acres of land that had not been discussed or talked about in that debate. The Secretary of the Interior suggested to the President to make his deed so as to cover the Cheyenne and Arapahoe lands that we bought and promised to pay for by this appropriation of 743,000 acres of land besides that we did not propose to buy. That is the superior justice with which the Government of the United States seems to be dealing with the Choctaws now!

The rules to be applied in the present case are those which govern public treaties, which, even in case of controversies between nations equally independent, are not to be read as rigidly as documents between private persons governed by a system of technical law, but in the light of that larger reason which constitutes the spirit of the law of nations. And it is the treaties made between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, holding such a relation, the assumptions of fact and of right which they presuppose, the acts and conduct of the parties under them, which constitute the material for settling the controversies which have arisen under them. The rule of interpretation already stated, as arising out of the nature and relation of the parties, is sanctioned and adopted by the express terms of the treaties themselves. In the eleventh article of the treaty of 1855, the Government of the United States expresses itself as being desirous that the rights and claims of the Choctaw people against the United States "shall receive a just, fair, and liberal consideration."

Yet the Senator from Iowa admits that there is something due these people or that something ought to be paid these people for this land. The only criticism he can make is that there was a hasty appropriation made, not considered by the Senate or the House Committee on Indian Affairs. The committee heard this question discussed at meeting after meeting, in which it was considered; they examined it thoroughly, and they authorized the report of this very amendment in the form in which it went into the bill, and by the vote of the committee sent it to the Committee on Appropriations, so as to make it in order, to put the Committee on Appropriations and the Senate on notice that the amendment would be presented and be here for settlement.

The President, in his message, suggests that all these matters ought to be settled at once, and the Senator from Iowa is very anxious that this matter shall now be sent back to the Committee on Indian Affairs for the purpose of having some method formulated by which these different questions can be settled. Senators seem to have forgotten that at the very time this amendment was offered in the Senate we were discussing the ratification of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe agreement, and I took the ground at that time, that if we were proposing to pay for the interest of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes in this land we ought at the same time to pay for what other interest the Choctaws and Chickasaws had to the same land, and, following the President's suggestion, to settle up the whole matter at once. That was the reason the amendment was offered. It was adopted by the Senate in view of that fact and with that light before it.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean to be understood as saying that the amendment which was offered to the appropriation bill in the Fifty-first Congress, which was passed by the Senate, and which constitutes now the ground of this controversy, was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs before it was offered here by him as the organ of that committee?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is precisely what I stated. I do not know at how many meetings of the committee this matter was considered, but it was discussed before the committee, and fully and completely discussed, and, so far as I am concerned, my mind was fully made up, as I think were the minds of most of the members of the committee. I moved myself in the committee that

I be authorized to report this amendment to the appropriation bill, and it was agreed to by the committee. It came here, and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that was the reason why the point of order made by the Senator from Iowa at the time against it was overruled, and the reason why the appropriation was put upon the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I do not venture to dispute with the Senator how it was that the committee agreed to this item reported, so as to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but it is my impression that, instead of moving it in committee, the Senator polled the members of the committee on the floor, and it was quite a perfunctory matter. I presume, however, he is right about it, though my impression was the other way.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will not undertake to say that the Senator from Connecticut is mistaken, but there is no question that this matter was considered in the committee. We had it carefully considered. We had the identical map that is on that easel now [indicating] before the committee; we looked into the whole history and origin of this matter and followed it up carefully from time to time. My recollection of what was done in the committee is exactly as I have stated it here, though, of course, after the lapse of this time and the number of things I have been engaged in, I will not undertake to say that I am not mistaken, though I do not think I am.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not true that, having considered this matter in committee, we decided not to act definitely upon it in committee during that session?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think not. If it had been so decided certainly the committee would not have authorized me to report the amendment here for the purpose of bringing it into the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment, then, was not the concoction of the Senator's brain, sprung suddenly upon the Senate, without consideration by the Indian Committee?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On the contrary, it had been first, I think, maturely and carefully considered, and I supposed every member of the committee had his mind fully made up about it. We agreed in committee that we would not have time to secure final action upon a separate bill if reported. Possibly what the Senator says might have been true, though I do not remember that. I do not think that was the case.

Mr. PLATT. My only interest in getting at the matter is that I feel that I have constantly been opposed to this appropriation for this amount from the very first time I have ever heard of it, and I can not believe I assented to it, unless it was in some perfunctory way to enable it to be taken before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. After all, it gets back at last to the question of amount. The only complaint that is made against this matter is its amount.

The Senator from Iowa found a report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House, in which they stated the amount that ought to be paid for these lands at $1.05 an acre. I do not know how that was arrived at, but I would not feel myself bound by the action of that committee in ascertaining the amount of money that was due to these people. I believe on my conscience that $1.25 an acre is a miserably small compensation for this territory, and I believe $1.25 an acre has been generally accepted as the amount to be paid. These people ought to be paid what has been paid to the Creeks and Seminoles. We have offered $1.25 to the Cherokees, and it is a standing offer of the Government, for all their millions of acres, and they have spurned it. Recently they have entered into an agreement by which they are to have $1.42 an acre besides divers other rights and privileges, amounting to a great deal more, probably to $2 an acre.

I do not think $1.25 is unreasonable; but that is the criticism, that is the objection which is made by these Senators whenever they come to discuss this matter.

We passed a law two or three years ago creating what is called the Cherokee Commission. The language was that this commission should treat with the Cherokees and all other tribes in the Indian Territory for whatever right, title, or claim they had to any land. The Choctaws and Chickasaws appointed delegates to go before that commission and present their claims. When they went before the commission they were notified by the commission that they had no right to their land, they had no claim to it, and the commission would not treat with them, they would not discuss it, would not talk about it.

It subsequently came out that the Secretary of the Interior, notwithstanding the fact that the law said that the commission should treat with the Cherokees and all other Indians in that Territory for whatever right, title, or claim they might have, had decided that the Choctaws and Chickasaws had no claim. The commission made treaties with other people, but they left these people out. When their commissioner returned to their council and reported that the commission refused to treat with them, that the Secretary of the Interior had prejudged their case, in their desperation they passed an act providing for the payment of 25 per cent on whatever amount could be recovered to be paid for the prosecution of their claim before Congress. They remembered their experience in the net-proceeds case. They had seen other things of the same kind here before.

The Chickasaws had a claim that originated in 1844. They had a trust fund that was in the hands of the Government of the United States, and by a simple mistake in bookkeeping an amount of about $250,000 was dropped out of that trust fund. They sent their agents here to press that claim from year to year upon the Government, and insisted that that amount should be restored to their trust fund. It was not done for more than forty years, and it was done at last at the expense of about 40 per cent of the amount. Thus by a mere matter of plain bookkeeping as gross an injustice was perpetrated as ever any helpless people were subjected to. The Government of the United States had the money, and the Government of the United States had the obligation of a trustee and its conscience behind it, and with all that—I should like to go all through all the details of this matter, and it would show you the reason why these people had some doubt about the liberality and justice of the United States towards them—and yet this matter of simple bookkeeping could not be corrected in more than forty years, and then it was done at an expense of 30 or 40 per cent of the amount of money the Indians recovered.

When the Indian delegates who had been before the Cherokee commission went back and reported to their council that the commission refused to treat with them, that the Secretary of the Interior had prejudged their case, then it was that the council passed this act providing for the payment of 25 per cent to their agents, three of their own people, part of their own tribe, to come here and prosecute this claim. If they had had the same experience that the Chickasaws had in their trust-fund case it would have been a poor bargain to them, for their expenses would have amounted to more than the 25 per cent which they were to be allowed before they ever got the money.

In this case the Government acted somewhat more promptly. I made the motion in the Senate that this provision should be put on the appropriation bill. I did it because I believed as solemnly as I am a living man that the honor of this Government is pledged for the payment of this money, and I believe we besmirch ourselves whenever we refuse to pay it. I know men as honest as I am differ with me in this conviction, but a very large majority of the Senate voted in favor of putting it on the appropriation bill and a large majority of the other House did the same. It is to-day the law of the land, and yet these people can not get their money.

One of the complaints which the Senator from Iowa particularly harped on was the payment of this 25 per cent to these attorneys. These are some of the reasons why this 25 per cent had to be paid, and the Government of the United States is to-day to blame because these people made such a contract. They never would have made it if the Government had been in the habit of dealing fairly with them. If the Government had heretofore paid the debts that were due by it the Indians never would have paid anybody 25 or 10 or 5 per cent to press a claim like this. It is because of their experience with the Government, because they had had claims here before which had been ignored, and in which they had been treated in a way not creditable to the Government, in a way that has caused our own highest judicial tribunal to criticise the courts of the Government, that they were willing to resort to these desperate means, and because of their fear of long delay they were unwilling to incur the expense of prosecution, but laid the whole burden and weight of that upon the three men selected by the governor to make this prosecution.

But, Mr. President, while the Senator from Iowa in his argument did not say in hac verba that the Government of the United States was paying this 25 per cent, he almost said it; he came pretty near it. That, the Senator from Iowa knows perfectly well, is not a fair statement of the proposition. Every dollar of this money goes from the United States to the Choctaws and Chickasaws for the debt we owe them, and goes by the terms of this bill into their treasury. What they do with their money after they get it is a matter for them to determine. We have solemnly agreed in our treaty stipulations with them that we will guaranty them the right of managing their own internal affairs in their own way, and if they choose to waste, to misappropriate, or to misapply this money it is not our fault.

My position in this case is that this money being due to these people shall be paid them honestly and fairly, and I shall always believe it is a burning shame and disgrace to this Government that we have so conducted ourselves towards the Indians heretofore as to make them willing to pay 25 per cent to prosecute an honest claim against this Government. It is no credit to us. The history of Indian legislation, from the beginning until now, bears out that suggestion. Only the other day the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] presented a report to the Senate, from which I shall read a few lines to show how we have been conducting ourselves in these Indian matters all along:

The claim presented by this bill seeks only a long delayed redress for acts of neglect on the part of the United States in the fulfillment of pecuniary promises which were made for valuable cessions of land, some of them a half century ago, and of which the Indian grantors, though sometimes suffering the extreme of want, have been unjustly deprived.

Mr. PLATT. Is that in relation to this case?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No, sir; but it is in relation to a case where the Government of the United States has bought Indian land and has refused to pay for it for fifty years. It only shows that the Indians have some reason to apprehend unfair treatment on the part of the Government, and it shows that the Indians had not acted so absurdly and foolishly as many would think when they agreed to pay 25 per cent to certain parties to prosecute this claim and hold them free of all the expenses incurred and of all the risks involved in it.

So far from this 25 per cent compensation being a matter for us to complain about, it seems to me that it is a matter that we ought to be heartily ashamed of, for it has been our fault, our neglect, our failure to do our duty to these Indians which has made such things possible.

The Senator from Iowa gave notice to the Senate that he would move to recommit this proposition to the Committee on Indian Affairs. He may do so, and he may succeed in recommitting it. He has discussed this matter as if it were a proposition on the part of the Senate to make an appropriation. Such is not the case.

The Senator criticises the resolution that I have presented on the part of the committee for the use of the words—

That for reasons set forth in the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the President's message—

We recommend that no action be taken. The conclusion is what I am interested in. The conclusion seems to me inevitable, and the Senator from Iowa coincides with part of the conclusion; but he thinks the amount is just a little too much. He did not make any criticism that this money was not due.

The reason why he did not want it paid to them was that the amount was too large. There is money due these people. He does not pretend to deny that, and he will not deny it, and there is not a man in the Senate who will deny it. Nobody who has paid any attention to this question will deny it. There is something due to these people. The Senator says because the committee of the House have concluded that $1.05 an acre ought to be paid to the Indians, therefore when we agreed to pay $1.25 for this land we agreed to pay too much.

I have in my possession a statement made by a man of high pecuniary standing, occupying an important political position now, in which he stated to the representatives of the Chickasaw Nation, Messrs. Love and Birney, neither of whom I ever saw, but who I understand are the regular delegates of the Chickasaw Nation, that if they could procure legislation to put the land up for sale, a syndicate could be organized to buy this land at $5 an acre, and that he believed a handsome profit could be made upon that price by the syndicate. He is a man familiar with Western affairs, familiar with the value of Western lands, and yet, when these people have been told that they can get $5 an acre—and I have no doubt in the world they can—and when the Government of the United States proposes to pay $1.25 an acre and sell for $1.50 an acre to people who are anxious to buy it and pay $1.50 for it, and they are ready to rush over the boundaries and take each other's lives in their struggle to get the first claim upon a quarter section—when that is the case, we propose to pay the Indian $1.25 an acre, 25 cents an acre less than we are selling to people engaged in this sort of struggle, the Senator from Iowa thinks we are paying too much, and wants to get back to $1.05 an acre.

Mr. PLATT. I wish, right in this connection, to ask the Senator to turn me to the statement of the commission, where the portion of this $1,500,000 which the Government paid to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes was to be paid according to certain terms or certain methods which he spoke of? I do not find it in any of their reports.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not suppose it has been printed; because when I wanted to know what that amount was, after I read the President's message suggesting that a large part of this amount would be needed for this purpose, I addressed a note to the Secretary of the Interior, and I have this from him in reply:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 17, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant making inquiry relative to the value placed upon the different holdings of land bought from the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians by the coumission that negotiated with them, the reply to which has been delayed by my absence from the city.

Referring thereto I have the honor to state that the Cherokee Commission reported to the Department that they had determined the apportionment as follows:

The Executive order reservation, $250,000 and allotments of land in said reservation. The treaty reservations, $1,250,000.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. NOBLE, Secretary.

Hon. J. K. JONES,
United States Senate.

On that authority I made the statement that $250,000 was the amount paid out of the million and a half for the entire executive order reservation, which embraced more than 4,000,000 acres, and this amount here would be less than $150,000 going to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes for the country below the Canadian River.

Mr. TELLER. May I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], with the consent of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], that the Cheyennes and Arapahoes have no title whatever, and we need not have paid them anything for the country which they occupy. They were given by the treaty of 1867 a large tract of country north of where they have been living, which they declined to accept. In 1869 the President gave them a reservation established by executive order, but of course he did not and could not give them any title whatever to it.

Mr. PERKINS. And for which they paid nothing.

Mr. TELLER. And for which they paid nothing, and we purchased, of course, their treaty rights out of the country lying north of it, and we need not have given them anything; but I suppose the purpose probably was to quiet them, and so it was fixed in that way.

Mr. PLATT. As I understand it, they refused to go on the lands which the Government authorized them to go on by treaty up in the Outlet.

Mr. TELLER. They went immediately south of it, on land adjoining.

Mr. PLATT. Now, it is a question whether they did not forfeit all their rights under that treaty and substitute for them the rights which they got under the executive order in the leased lands.

Mr. TELLER. If I may be allowed, I wish to state now, because there seems to be an impression here that the President of the United States can give to Indians title to land by executive order, that he can no more do that than he can give title to me.

Mr. PLATT. He gives them the right of occupancy.

Mr. TELLER. That is true.

Mr. PLATT. And they can keep it forever.

Mr. TELLER. And they can keep it forever, but he can make no title that we can not disturb whenever we see fit.

Mr. DAWES. It may be ended at the will of the Executive.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; it may be ended at the will of the Executive whenever he see fit.

Mr. PLATT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On this very point I will read a word from the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior to the Cherokee Commission. Secretary Noble, on page 9 of the report, says:

The select committee of the Senate, in its report on the removal of the Northern Cheyennes, etc., in speaking of the lands set apart for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes by the executive order of August 10, 1869, say that "it was never intended to be more than a temporary abiding place for these tribes, where they were to stop until the United States could extinguish the claim of the Cherokees to the lands included in the treaties with the Arapahoes and Cheyennes." (Senate Report No. 708, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, page 2.)

These lands, it must be conceded, were secured to these tribes by solemn treaty stipulation, and they have made no treaty ceding them nor agreement of relinquishment that this is of any binding force or effect. They have committed no act of forfeiture.

That answers directly the question of the Senator from Connecticut, as if the Secretary thought some man was going to ask that very question.

Their title stands to-day as it did at the date of the ratification of the treaty of 1867. As between the United States and the Cheyennes and Arapahoes the title to the lands is in these Indians, and they have a perfect and indisputable right to now remove to that reservation and enjoy all the privileges guaranteed to them by the treaty.

That answers the question as to whether these people have forfeited these 5,000,000 acres of land. The plain English of the matter is that these people absolutely own 5,000,000 acres of land in the Cherokee Strip and the country south of it. They own that, and for that the Government has driven a bargain and bought for a million and a quarter of dollars 5,000,000 acres of land. The Government in the market will sell that land at $1.50 an acre, and no less.

The Secretary of the Interior says they get an indefeasible title. The Government pays a million and a quarter of dollars for 5,000,000 acres of land, and then for more than 4,000,000 acres that was in an Executive order reserved, paid for a quitclaim about $250,000, or about 6 cents an acre.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator criticised my suggestion as respects the reasons for the passage of the resolution. I, of course, criticised somewhat the details of the report, but I did not call attention to one paragraph in the report which I will call the attention of the Senator to now. In summing up this case—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What page?

Mr. ALLISON. I will read from page 22 of the report.

In summing up this case the Senator says:

13. To assume that the cession of 1836 was intended by the parties to the treaty as an absolute conveyance is to assume that the Choctaws and Chickasaws intended to convey and the United States intended to acquire, without any compensation whatever, 7,713,236 acres of land, worth more than $10,000,000 in 1886 and worth more than $40,000,000 at the present time.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will stand by that.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I know the Senator stands by it, but if his argument be true and we pass this resolution, then we shall commit the Senate of the United States to pay $40,000,000 for this land, because if that is right and the Indians own it, we ought to pay it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Iowa is so able and so clear-headed a lawyer, so shrewd, that I regard that criticism as a very great compliment, for it shows to what straits he is driven to undertake to present some objection to this resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely called the attention of the Senator to that as a part of the criticism I make.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no suggestion and nothing that could be considered in that way, nothing on the face of the earth. It only goes in connection with my argument. I undertook to show that the land west of the one hundredth meridian had been paid for, and that the $800,000 paid in 1855 might reasonably have been held to go for the extinguishment of the title to that land, and it would be only about 12½ cents an acre for it. The Government had the leased district without compensation at all, without paying anything, but this goes beyond that. In 1866 the Senator claims that this Government bought this land, and I assert that he can not read section 3 of the treaty of 1866 and fail to see, if he reads the whole of it, that that $300,000 was paid not for land, but was paid for the making of citizens of 3,000 negroes on the assumption that there were 3,000 negroes there, but it was shown subsequently that there were about 5,000 negroes, and they were given the right to 40 acres of land apiece.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see the point I am trying to make, though it may be very far-fetched, but the Senator asserts that the Choctaws and Chickasaws own this land, and that it is worth $40,000,000. If they own it and it is worth that sum and we ought to acquire it, then we ought to pay what it is worth. Therefore, the argument which the Senator asks us to indorse is that we shall pay $40,000,000 instead of the $10,000,000 that we are bound to pay.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will state to the Senator that if he has ever read this case he has read it very hastily, I think, or he would not have taken that position.

Mr. PERKINS. I will suggest, with the permission of the Senator from Arkansas, that we have already completed our agreement with the Indians, provided we pay them, as is proposed by the act of Congress, what we obligated ourselves to pay. The papers are ready, and they convey title to the Government of the United States, and when the Government of the United States pays for the land, as it has obligated itself to do, and the contract has already been made, it only remains for the Government to execute it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The United States has taken the benefit of its side of the contract, and can not refuse to carry it out. It is selling the land at $1.50 per acre and is unwilling to pay $1.25 for it. That is all there is of it. That is the case in a nutshell. All we want and all we ask is that the Government shall simply go on and carry out its solemn obligation made by a law passed by a large majority in both Houses of Congress and approved by the President of the United States, and not keep this thing open.

Mr. GEORGE. Does that law provide, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, for the extinguishment of the Indian right to all this land?

Mr. PERKINS. Absolutely.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Absolutely, every claim.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator now to claim that, if we pay this money, we shall have acquired title to the strip of lands west of the ninety-eighth meridian?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That occupied by the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. That is but a little less than one-third of it.

Mr. PERKINS. Almost 3,000,000 acres of it.

Mr. ALLISON. If we pay them for 3,000,000 acres we must pay to about the same extent for the remaining 6,000,000 acres, and $7,000,000 more will have to be added to the $3,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Government wants the land it ought to be willing to pay a fair compensation for it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator thinks it is worth $40,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no question about that. I suppose even the Senator from Iowa will not deny it.

Mr. GEORGE. If it belongs to the Indians and the Government wants it why should it not pay $40,000,000?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the argument of the report.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Indians came here with a proposition to sell this land at $1.25 an acre and insisted that they should be paid whatever was right. They admit that the Government has the right of occupation, but they insist it was conveyed for a specific purpose and for a use, and it has been so understood by the executive branch of the Government all the time. When the Government proposes to put it to any other use it can not in good conscience, it can not in common fairness refuse to compensate the Indians for the additional right that we get in this land.

Mr. President, I have been somewhat hurried in this matter. I was very much in hope that we might get to a vote on it this evening, and I trust we may do so yet. I shall not detain the Senate longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the hour is so late that it hardly seems probable that we shall be able to secure a vote on the resolution this afternoon, and yet there are some things in connection with it which I desire to speak of for a few minutes, and to talk rapidly concerning some propositions involved in this discussion.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] talks earnestly and talks well, as he talks earnestly and well upon all subjects which he discusses; but it does seem, as has been suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], that the Senator from Iowa has worked industriously and labored ingeniously to frame an argument in opposition to this resolution.

As has been suggested, this matter was considered in the Fifty-first Congress, and carefully considered, first, in the House of Representatives upon a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs of that body. The Committee on Indian Affairs of the House had this subject before it for its consideration and for investigation, and reported an independent measure to the House, recommending the purchase of these lands from the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and recommending, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that they be paid $1.05 an acre for the lands. That bill was discussed upon the floor of the House for almost two days. It provided for the purchase of all the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaws lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth meridians. A vote was never reached upon it. Pending the consideration of that measure in the House, the Indian appropriation bill was reached for consideration, and in that Indian appropriation bill an amendment was incorporated ratifying an agreement with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians for a part of these Choctaw and Chickasaw lands.

That agreement with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes has been discussed here. It was to extinguish the little title or right that they had to these lands, known as the Choctaw and Chickasaw lands, and also to extinguish their rights to treaty lands in the Cherokee Outlet; lands that they secured under treaty obligations in 1867 from the Cherokees and the Government of the United States.

In that agreement no provision whatever was made for the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and when the matter was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House, it was proposed, as we were extinguishing the equities of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, that we also ought to extinguish the equities and the rights of the Choctaws and Chickasaws to the same tract. I had the honor of being chairman of that committee in the House during that Congress.

It may be proper and well to give a brief history of that legislation. As chairman of that committee I opposed the proposition, and suggested that we ought to consider the claim of the Choctaws and Chickasaws as an independent measure and not as a part of the Indian appropriation bill, and I kept the proposition pertaining to the Choctaws and Chickasaws out of the Indian appropriation bill while the House of Representatives was acting on that bill.

When the Indian appropriation bill reached this body for consideration, upon the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], in open session here, this body decided after an able and thorough discussion and a ye-and-nay vote to adjust the equities of the Choctaws and Chickasaws in connection with the ratification of the agreement with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes.

As suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, we were proposing to open these lands to white settlement; we were proposing to give to the settlers of the country the right to go in there and to make homes, and it was said—and said as I believe truthfully upon this floor, and it was truthfully said upon the floor of the other House subsequently—that the Choctaws and Chickasaws had never consented that these lands should be opened to white settlement. They had consented under the treaty of 1866 that friendly Indians might be located there, or that Indians from other sections of the country might be located there, but they had never consented that a Territorial government should be organized there and that white settlers should be permitted to make homes on these lands.

Under the treaty made with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes we were proposing to do this, although the Cheyennes and Arapahoes had no right there except the right given to them by the President of the United States under an executive order, and for which they had paid nothing.

So it was contended here logically, and, it seems, with the approval of this body, that, as we were to open these lands to settlement, in connection with such act we ought to adjust the claims, the equities, of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

The Senator from Arkansas moved an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill proposing to do this, proposing to pay the Chickasaws and Choctaws $1.25 an acre in consideration of their equities. After that proposition was discussed and elaborately discussed upon the floor of the Senate, it met the approval and the conscience of a majority of this body and it was adopted. Then the bill went to the House of Representatives for the House to concur or nonconcur in that amendment. Upon my motion the House nonconcurred, and the bill went into the hands of a conference committee. As one of those conferees I objected to this Senate amendment, and we reported a disagreement to the two bodies.

The Senate directed its conferees to stand by the Senate amendment and not to recede therefrom, and the House, upon a ye-and-nay vote, directed me, as one of its conferees, to consent to that Senate amendment after a thorough discussion of these equities and of all the rights involved in this contention. It was earnestly opposed by Mr. Cannon, who was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House, and others, and he had the arguments there to sustain him, which have been so well presented to-day by the Senator from Iowa. But, as before suggested, after that measure was thoroughly discussed in the House, upon motion and upon a ye-and-nay vote the House conferees were directed to consent to the Senate amendment, and thus it became a provision of and a part of the Indian appropriation bill.

But the amendment was considered as an independent measure in both bodies. Congress was not compromised in any way by having coupled with it other propositions that might meet the approval of the Senate or the House. It came independently, standing upon its merits, and presented itself to the conscience of the two bodies as a proposition of right. Having been thus considered and having been thus accepted by both bodies of Congress, and having been approved by the President of the United States, we yet find the Administration refusing to discharge its obligations and sending a message to Congress asking again for its consideration.

It does seem to me, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that it is a remarkable proposition. If on the 4th of March next there should be some man inaugurated President of the United States who might criticize or be disposed to differ with some legislation enacted by this Congress, he might, with the same propriety, after his inauguration, suspend the execution of the law and send it to the Congress that may be elected in November next for its consideration and review. If that precedent is recognized as a proper precedent, if one Congress is to be called upon in this way to review and to reconsider the action of a preceding Congress, what act of Congress may not be suspended and what law of the land may not be ignored and violated by an Executive?

Personally I do not believe in this proposition. I believe that this measure was considered thoroughly and discussed intelligently, and that the conscience of the two bodies of Congress indorsed the claim made by the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians as to these lands.

As has been so well said by the Senator from Arkansas, no man who has ever investigated this claim has doubted for one moment that these Choctaws and Chickasaws ought to have something for their equity in these lands. If you concede that they ought to have something, then logically and naturally the question suggests itself, how much; and that is a matter for Congress. It is not a matter for the Executive, it is not a matter for the Interior Department, but it is a matter for Congress, and the Senate, as well as the House of Representatives in the last Congress considered that $1.25 an acre for this land was not an unreasonable price. I confess we might differ in judgment as to how much should be paid, but when Congress settled the price it was settled forever if accepted by the Indians.

It is claimed, however, by the Executive and by others, that the Indians, the Choctaws and Chickasaws, presumed upon the good nature of Congress; presumed upon the innocence, perhaps, of the Senators and Members and drove a sharp bargain with Congress, and got more for these lands than in equity they ought to have received. That is the only argument suggested in opposition to this legislation.

It has been claimed for one hundred years and more that the Government of the United States has been taking advantage of the Indians, has been driving sharp bargains with them, has been imposing upon their ignorance and their necessities, and has been taking lands from them without giving just compensation in return; but now, for the first time in the history of this Government, it is claimed that the Indians have taken advantage of the Government, that they are receiving more for their lands than they ought to receive; and because of this proposition, a solemn enactment of Congress is to be suspended by the chief executive, the President, and Congress is called upon to review and to reconsider its action.

With the same propriety any tribe who had a claim against the Government of the United States in the past, and who has received full compensation therefor, might come forward and say that at the time their measure was considered and the compensation proposed, they did not receive as much as they ought to have received, and for that reason the legislation should be reconsidered.

Mr. President, if Congress erred in this matter let it be said to our credit that we erred in the right direction; that we erred in the direction of liberality and justice, and that for once Congress did more than justice could have demanded in dealing with the wards of the nation.

The Senator from Iowa says that this is a dangerous precedent, that these Choctaws and Chickasaws have other lands there that were not secured under the act of last year, and if we now pay them $1.25 an acre for these lands, we shall be called upon to pay them $1.25 an acre for the lands that remain. That may be true, but yet at the same time it does not necessarily follow that Congress will do that, and Congress has the power in its own hands, the absolute power, to do with these Indians what it thinks right and fair to do, and if it should be the conscience and judgment of Congress that we have paid too much for these two million six hundred thousand and odd acres, we can correct it when we secure the remaining lands from them. It is in the power of Congress to do this, the remedy is with us, and the correction can be made then, made logically, made intelligently, and made, as it should be, without suspending a solemn act of Congress.

But the Senator says that attorneys or agents who were employed by these Indians are to receive large compensation for their services. That, perhaps, is true, as has been suggested here, and yet this act which has been criticised, does not in any way recognize their attorneys' fee or claim, and no provision is made for its payment in the law, no recognition of it is made in the law, and, so far as Congress is concerned, there was no knowledge of it. We do not propose in any way by this act to pay it, nor do we recognize it, but we do propose, by the provisions of the act, to pay the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians $1.25 an acre for these lands to extinguish their right and equity therein. Then when this money is covered into their treasury, they discharge their obligations with it as to them seems right and proper. If they have employed attorneys and agents who have rendered them valuable and faithful service they ought to pay them.

It may be that the fee is a large one, but, as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, when the history of Indian legislation is remembered, when the past is recalled, and we review the treatment that the Indians as a rule have received from the Government of the United States, we must confess that when they made this agreement for attorneys' fees, in the light of this history, it was not an exorbitant one.

But these agents were successful and the representatives of the Indians were fortunate in getting this matter early considered, and because they were successful in working for their clients, and in securing for their people more than was expected or reasonable, it is claimed that they ought not to be paid for their services. That is the logic of the argument!

Mr. President, it does not seem to me that one argument can be advanced by the most intelligent and ingenious Senator upon this floor which impeaches or destroys the equity of these Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians to these lands. As I suggested before, if we recognize the fact that they have an equity there, then logically the question comes, what shall we pay them to extinguish that equity? and that was settled in the last Congress, and as I believe, forever.

Now, we are proposing to pay to the Cherokees by a bill, or rather by a treaty, which is pending in this body at this time, $1.42 an acre, and to give them other rights for an easement that they have in the Cherokee Outlet.

Mr. PLATT. That is held by patent, and they never conveyed it to the Government, as these Indians did. They hold it by a deed from the President by metes and bounds, and they have made no conveyance to the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. I am quite well aware that the Senator from Connecticut believes that the Cherokee Indians have an absolute title to the Cherokee Outlet.

Mr. PLATT. They have a deed signed by the President of the United States for fifty years.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from Connecticut is too good a lawyer not to know that a patent issued by an executive officer in violation of law and in excess of his authority, conveys no title.

Mr. PLATT. I know it is too late in dealing with the Indians, at least I think it is after a half-century has passed and the Indians hold their land by a deed from the President of the United States, conveying it to them by metes and bounds, to say that they have not any title.

Mr. PERKINS. But that question does not necessarily enter into this discussion, and I am not going to discuss at this time the claims of the Cherokees to the Cherokee Outlet.

In my opinion, their equities and their title to that Cherokee Outlet are not as great as the equity of the Choctaws and Chickasaws to this land between the ninety-eighth and the one hundredth meridian, but the Senator from Connecticut may believe that it is a greater one. But, whether greater or less, we are proposing to give to them certain rights and to pay them $1.42 an acre for the lands that are known as the Cherokee Outlet, and yet in 1866 they proposed to convey those lands to the Government of the United States for about 47 cents an acre, and in 1867 5,000,000 acres, or near that, of those lands were secured for the purpose of settling the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians there.

Mr. ALLISON. At 30 cents an acre.

Mr. PERKINS. Thirty cents an acre.

Mr. TELLER. That was 30 cents an acre with the stipulation, if I may be allowed to state, that we should have the amount determined by arbitration, but we finally concluded we would settle that thing ourselves, and we did settle it and we paid it. We selected our own arbitrators, and decided it for ourselves.

Mr. PERKINS. We fixed our own price.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, we fixed our own price.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, to resume briefly, as has been contended here, in 1820 these lands were ceded to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians in satisfaction of rights and lands that they owned east of the Mississippi, and under that treaty they took possession of these lands. Subsequently, the treaty of 1830 was made, as has been stated by the Senator from Iowa. Under the treaty of 1820, no one contends that all the lands lying west of the one hundredth meridian claimed by these Choctaws and Chickasaws, was not conveyed to them absolutely. But then came the question, which was considered, perhaps, not intelligently by these Choctaws and Chickasaws, but considered in their way at the time of the making of the treaty of 1830; and at the time of the making of the treaty of 1830 the one hundredth meridian was recognized as their western boundary.

But notwithstanding that treaty, these Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, in consideration of the rights that they had relinquished to the Government of the United States and because of the treaty of 1820, insisted and claimed that they had equities west of the one hundredth meridian, and it is current history, as I suggested to the Senator from Iowa when he was upon the floor, that the Choctaws and Chickasaws did make this claim until 1855, when the treaty was made. In that treaty the Government of the United States recognized—whether it was a valid claim or not—they recognized that the Choctaws and Chickasaws did make a claim to those lands west of the one hundredth meridian, and in that treaty the right of the Choctaws and Chickasaws to those lands was extinguished, and in consideration of that, as has been suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, they received $800,000.

Certain rights were also given to the Government of the United States as to these lands now in contention, the lands lying between the ninety-eighth and the one hundredth meridians, known for years, ever since the treaty of 1855, as the leased district.

Under that treaty of 1855 the Choctaws and Chickasaws reserved to themselves the right to locate their people upon these lands, to occupy and possess them, to cultivate them, and to own them and to make their homes and to reside there as a people; but at the same time they consented that the Government of the United States might settle certain friendly Indians there, Indians living south of the Canadian River. Those conditions continued until 1866, when the treaty of that year was made. In the treaty of 1866 the right which the Choctaws and Chickasaws enjoyed under the treaty of 1855 was released. They deprived themselves, under the treaty of 1866, of the right of locating and settling their own people upon these lands, and they extended the privilege that the Government had theretofore enjoyed of locating certain friendly Indians there. That gave the Government the right to locate Indians there from any section of the country.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask a question?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator admits that the direct words of cession operated to destroy their right to settle there themselves, how does he get away from acknowledging that it destroyed all their rights there?

Mr. PERKINS. A man may deprive himself of his right to use and enjoy a piece of property that he owns, and yet he may not divest himself of his title. So the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians under the treaty of 1866 provided that the Government of the United States might settle Indians upon these lands known as the leased district, and they also, as I think, relinquished their right to settle there and to cultivate the lands themselves, but yet they never contended or contemplated, as the Senator from Iowa manfully admitted, that those lands should be opened by the Government of the United States to white settlement, nor did they contemplate or intend that a Territorial government should be established there.

All they intended to do—and that is shown, it seems to me, by the entire history of the transaction, the history of the treaty, the history of the convention that was held at Fort Smith and by the propositions that were extended to them by the Government of the United States was to create a trust in the Government, and it can not, it strikes me, be doubted or controverted that all they contemplated was to create such trust in the Government of the United States that it might locate friendly Indians there. When the Government attempted to do more than this, when the Government attempted to ratify an agreement made with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians and opened this land to settlement then the Choctaws and Chickasaws came forward and said: "Do justice to us in that connection, make to us compensation for the equity we have and for the right that we possess."

Now, what did they receive in consideration of the treaty of 1866? They had this valuable right that I have contended for. No one questions it for a moment, and yet under the treaty of 1866, if that is to be held as an absolute cession, they conveyed that great body of over 6,000,000 acres of land to the Government of the United States and received nothing in consideration therefor—nothing in the world, because, as has been so well said by the Senator from Arkansas, the $300,000 that was to be paid, and the most of which has been paid, was for the benefit of the freedmen, and not for the Indians themselves—not a dollar of it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In that connection, I wish to state that the $225,000 due the Choctaws has been paid, because the Choctaws have admitted their negroes to citizenship and the $75,000 to be paid the Chickasaws in case they admitted their negroes to citizenship, has not been paid because they have not yet done that.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator does not mean to say that the Chickasaws have not been paid that money during all these years. They received $50,000 immediately, and in other adjustments they have received about $7,000 more, I am told.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to be understood as saying that nothing has been paid the Chickasaws in consideration under this article of the treaty. In another article of the treaty it was agreed that the Government would at that time advance to the Choctaws $150,000, and would advance to the Chickasaws $50,000. That was to be advanced, but not a dollar has been paid to these Indians for these lands as they consider this $50,000 that was advanced on the land to them by the Government at that time as belonging to the Government of the United States now, and so considered it all the time.

Mr. PERKINS. As has been suggested, in 1883 the Choctaw Indians admitted into their nationality, so to speak, the freedmen residing among them. Therefore they had not been treated as citizens; therefore their rights had not been recognized; they had not been accorded the privileges of citizenship; and so in 1866, when the treaty was made, the Government of the United States attempted to make some provision for the freedmen residing among the Choctaws, and it proposed to pay the $300,000 to assist in securing homes for them, provided they removed from the Choctaw Nation, but if they did not remove from the Choctaw Nation, but were given homes and the rights of citizenship among the Choctaw people, then this $300,000 was to be paid to the Choctaws and Chickasaws in consideration therefor.

The Choctaws did grant this privilege by resolution in 1883, and since that time the freedmen residing among them enjoy the privileges and benefits of citizenship. In consequence of that the Choctaws received their share of this $300,000, and it was paid to them because of the loss of their home lands taken by the freedmen, and not for the lands ceded the Government under the treaty of 1866.

But the Chickasaws have not given this privilege to the freedmen, and hence as to them the payment has not been made. So that, as I argue and as I contend, under the treaty of 1866 the Choctaws and Chickasaws get nothing; and yet it is argued that under the provisions of that agreement and treaty it was contemplated by them that they conveyed absolutely to the Government of the United States this great body of valuable land.

The proposition seemed monstrous when it was contended for upon the floor of the Senate a year ago and more. It seemed monstrous when it was contended for upon the floor of the other House. Hence it did not meet the conscience of this body nor did it meet the conscience of the other body; and so Congress said in solemn consideration of this question, when these lands were opened to settlement justice ought to be extended to these contending Indians. So in consideration of the proposition, Congress declared that it would pay them $1.25 an acre for these lands when they would execute to the President of the United States conveyances that in form and substance were satisfactory to him.

As I understand it, no objection is made by him to the form or to the substance of the conveyances that they tender. They are ready to convey to the Government of the United States not only their equity but every right that they ever claimed as to these lands, and all they ask now from this body and from the Administration is that the Administration will observe and respect a solemn enactment of Congress and do justice to them.

After they have made this appeal to the Executive he sends it to this body asking us to review the solemn consideration that we gave to this question more than a year ago. As has been stated here, these lands have been opened to settlement under that very act, the act to make the appropriation to the Choctaws and Chickasaws for this land. It was opened to settlement on the 19th day of this month, and it is estimated that more than 40,000 settlers went in there and took possession of those lands, and in order that the Government should lose nothing from these negotiations, in order that every dollar should be returned to the Treasury of the United States and that the Government should be made whole, we charged those settlers $1.50 an acre for those lands, and after having charged the settlers $1.50 an acre for the lands the proposition is made to us that we ought to repudiate our solemn agreement and arrangement made with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and cheat them out of what we have proposed to pay them, $1.25 an acre.

These lands are substantially occupied. Here is the great body [indicating on the map]. The counties of C, D, E, F, G, H, and I, in Oklahoma Territory, have been recently organized. In those counties are the lands of which we are speaking, and settlers are there, 40,000 of them, commencing their improvements and building their homes, and they are to pay to the Government of the United States $1.50 for them that we may do justice to the Choctaws and Chickasaws and observe our obligations to them; and yet the proposition is made that we ought not to do it, that we will take advantage of the settlers, that we will demand this price from them, but as to the Indians, to use a common expression, we will "chisel" them out of the money we solemnly and understandingly obligated ourselves to pay when ratifying the treaty made with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the Senate will consent so such a proposition. I do not believe the House of Representatives will consent to the proposition, and, I say it in candor and not in a spirit of unkindness, I am surprised that the Chief Executive of this nation would for a moment entertain such a proposition or would suggest it to this intelligent body.

There is much in this proposition that is deserving of thought, that is deserving of consideration, and yet the hour is late. The matter has been quite thoroughly discussed, and I have only attempted, not perhaps in a logical and consecutive order, but in a hasty way, to bring to the attention of this body some of the questions which it seems to me we ought to consider in connection with this proposition. I have not been able to convince myself for one moment that if the facts pertaining to these lands were considered and understood by this body it would reconsider the action taken more than a year ago; and believing this, so far as I am concerned I am willing to submit the question to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the manager of this resolution whether it is expected to take a vote this evening. If it is, I shall occupy just about three minutes on one branch of the case. Otherwise I may be permitted to submit a motion: to adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Speaking for myself I should be glad to have a vote this afternoon.

Mr. PALMER. Then, without detaining a vote on the resolution, I will content myself with denouncing the idea that the President has no right to suspend action in such a case, or that he ought not when he has a reason that satisfies him, believing that a measure like the one under consideration has been passed without deliberation, or when, as he says, he was compelled to approve it because it was a part of a bill that contained necessary appropriations to carry on the Government. I want to assert that in my belief the President has acted judiciously and properly, and that it is no reflection upon the Senate or the House of Representatives. I think that it is proper he should have acted as he did. I expect to vote upon the resolution, but I expect to decline to be bound by the recitals contained in it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will suggest to the Senator that the resolution does not propose to criticize the President. The resolution is only a declaration that the Senate sees no reason why the law should not be executed.

Mr. PALMER. I am only replying not so much to the terms of the resolution as to the commentary.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Arkansas kindly repeat what he said? He was not heard on this side.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I say that there is nothing in the resolution to criticize the action of the President. The resolution simply provides for an expression on the part of the Senate that they see no sufficient reason why the law shall not be executed. That is all there is of it.

Mr. ALLISON. "For reasons set forth in the report," etc. Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If it will be any satisfaction to the Senator from Iowa, I have no objection to striking those words out of the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought that was the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator from Iowa claim that there is anything in the report which reflects upon the President?

Mr. ALLISON. No, I do not claim it. I simply claim that the report in its language commits the Senate of the United States to statements which are not true.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the Senator's reasoning to be that the reasons set forth in the report are not sufficient to justify the resolution. Is it any more than that for reasons set forth in the report the committee see no sufficient reason? Is not that it? I speak from memory.

Mr. ALLISON. The resolution says:

That for reasons set forth in the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the President's message of February 18, 1892, upon the appropriation of March 3, 1891, for payment to Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations for their interest in the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Reservation in the Indian Territory, submitted with this resolution—

That is, for these reasons—

It is the opinion of the Senate, etc.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator emphasized the recital so much more than he did all the rest that I did not catch the point. Let me see. "For reasons set forth in the report." Now, suppose I drop the recital, "for reasons set forth in the report of the committee."

It is the opinion of the Senate that there is no sufficient reason for interference in the due execution of the law referred to.

Does the Senator mean to say anything more in criticism of the resolution than that the reasons set forth in the report are not in his opinion sufficient reasons?

Mr. ALLISON. What I mean to say is that I do not wish myself, under any circumstances, to vote that the argument of the report is a truthful statement of the history of this transaction.

Mr. DAWES. So I understood.

Mr. ALLISON. That is all I mean to say; and therefore I do not want—

Mr. DAWES. I understand the Senator. Someone said, I do not know who it was, that there was some language here that reflected on the President. As I drew the resolution myself, I do not like to have it rest there, unless they can point out what it is.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not remember any personal reflection upon the President, and I do not suppose any was intended; but I do not want to commit myself as a Senator to the report which precedes the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. So I understand that in the opinion of the Senator from Iowa the reasons set forth in the report would rather lead to action than to no action, that is, to arrest the statute.

Mr. ALLISON. No; if we believe what the report states, instead of appropriating $3,000,000 we ought to appropriate $40,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. And not believing these statements, the Senator thinks instead of saying there is no sufficient reason for arresting the statute there is sufficient reason for it. Is that true?

Mr. ALLISON. It does not follow that it is true. I do not quite understand what the Senator desires respecting this. As to myself, if I understand the resolution, and I may be mistaken about it, I will ask the Senator, as he says he drew the resolution, if it is his understanding that a vote adopting the resolution will agree to the arguments, suggestions, and statements made in the report?

Mr. DAWES. At some convenient time before the vote is taken I should like the privilege of stating to the Senate the reasons that led me to vote in committee and which will lead me to vote in the Senate to have the resolution adopted, and in that connection those reasons will I think appear.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 2, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 28, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

MEMORIAL HALL AT WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Acting Attorney-General in relation to the bequest of $250,000 to the United States by Gen. George W. Cullum, deceased, for the erection and maintenance of a memorial hall at the West Point Military Academy; which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOONER DOLPHIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the French spoliation claims arising out of the seizure of the schooner Dolphin; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIG CATHERINE, SCHOONER HANNAH, AND SCHOONER THREE FRIENDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the French spoliation claims arising out of the seizure of the following vessels: Brig Catherine, schooner Hannah, and schooner Three Friends; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE GORMAN, DECEASED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of George Gorman vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WOLFE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 31) for the relief of William Wolfe, of Shelby, Shelby County, Mo.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill. The same bill has been reported by a committee of the House. The House bill is on the Calendar, and the Senate has passed this bill unanimously.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the ground on which the Government is asked to pay. Is it freight money or the value of the vessel that is desired to be paid?

Mr. HATCH. The report is short, and I will ask that it be read, as it will explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report, subject to objection.

Mr. HATCH. I have the report of the House committee, which I desire to have read.

The report was read for information.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. DINGLEY said: I do not desire the further reading of the report, unless some other gentleman does. The claim seems to be founded entirely on the statement in the report that the vessel was impressed.

Mr. HATCH. The bill has repeatedly been reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, and it once passed the House and passed the Senate. I do not think there is a more fair or equitable bill before Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, whether military law was in force at the time of the impressment?

Mr. HATCH. I only know from the statement made in the report that it was.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. WATSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman permit the bill to lay on the table for the present? I would like to appeal to the gentleman. I have never objected to the request of a gentleman for unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill since I have been in Congress. I care nothing about it personally. If the gentleman will take the pains to listen to this report, or read it, he would see that this is the only means of obtaining the consideration of this claim. This party has waited for twenty years for the payment of this money from the Government, and this is probably the only opportunity he will get in this or any other Congress for proper relief.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I simply made an objection. I supposed it was not quite in order to give the reasons for the objection and that the objection alone was all that was necessary. I do object to an investigation of the kind here proposed, which carries with it authority to pay. I am willing that the investigation should be made and a report made to this House for us to consider.

Mr. HATCH. I suppose the gentleman understands that a like bill has been already reported to the House, and not only that, but this is a Senate bill, which has passed the other branch of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I stand by my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill may lie on the Speaker's table.

Mr. KILGORE. I think it ought to go to the committee, and take the usual course.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BUNTING, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. LIVINGSTON submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the position of assistant journal clerk be made an annual position, at the rate of $2,200 per annum, and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby instructed to make provision for such clerk in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, at the rate of $2,200 per annum from July 1, 1892.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. LIVINGSTON on March 11, 1892, respectfully report that the position of assistant journal clerk is a very arduous and laborious one. Under the present rules the work at the Journal Clerk's desk has been increased threefold. Prior to the Fifty-first Congress the bills, resolutions, reports, and memorials were formerly presented in open session and a list of the same was made by the Official Reporters for the RECORD. At present, under the rules, all of this work devolves upon the assistant journal clerk. During the last Congress it was found absolutely necessary to pass a special resolution putting on another man at the rate of $6 per day to assist the Journal Clerk and assistant journal clerk. Your committee have a similar resolution pending before them now.

The present assistant journal clerk says that by working extra hours he can accomplish the work and will cause a saving to the Government of this extra employé. It is far better to have this work performed by one man than two, in order to secure regularity and uniformity of the record, as one man can, from the nature of things, become thoroughly familiar with the routine and thereby avoid any mistakes that might arise from the interposition of temporary assistance. The wisdom of adopting this resolution becomes a demonstration when it is observed that in the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses this position was an annual one at $3,000 salary, while this resolution only calls for $2,000.

In those Congresses there were but 4,800 bills introduced, while in the Fifty-first Congress there were 14,000 measures proposed, and up to this time in the Fifty-second Congress (about half of the first session and all of the second session yet to come) there have been introduced nearly 8,500, of which 1,200 have been reported. Besides these there have been presented a great number of joint resolutions, concurrent resolutions, and State memorials, all of which must be recorded by this officer. It is the judgment of the committee that the interests of the Government, by securing the correct and faithful records of the House, would be greatly benefited by making this office of assistant journal clerk annual, and your committee therefore recommend that the resolution be passed with the following amendment: Strike out "$2,200," and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this report?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Accounts was agreed to.

The question was taken on the adoption of the report as amended; and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 11.

Mr. BAILEY. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me to say a word on this matter at this time?

The SPEAKER. The matter is debatable, the previous question not having been ordered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This is a report from the Committee on Accounts and it is clearly in the interest of economy. Last year—and we shall have to repeat the same thing this year—after the House adjourned it took two extra clerks six months to bring up this business. Now, in lieu of that it is proposed to make this position an annual one and to have one clerk to do the work. It appears to me to be clearly in the interest of economy—

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. A division has been called for and the yeas and nays demanded, and I do not think that debate is in order at this stage of the proceeding.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I certainly would not have proceeded if I had not been recognized by the Chair, and if I am out of order, then the Speaker is out of order.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I rose to a question of order to find out whether you were out of order or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS] makes the point that the House was dividing, and that therefore debate is not in order upon the proposition. The Chair thinks the point was well taken.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] be permitted to explain the proposition, because many of us are ignorant of its scope, and it may be that his explanation will satisfy us.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] be permitted to explain this resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, the object of this resolution is simply to save the expense of hiring two or three men to bring up the unfinished business in this department of the House after the adjournment of Congress. The Committee on Accounts has examined the matter carefully. The proposition is to make this man an annual clerk and let him do the work. Last year there were two assistants; now we have but one. Last year two extra men were employed. The Committee on Accounts proposes now simply to make this one man an annual clerk at a salary of $2,000, which is an absolute saving of $1,200 compared with what you will have to pay if you refuse to create this annual clerkship and undertake to bring up the unfinished business, as was done last year.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there anything in this report which requires this clerk to bring up that extra work?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir; that is directly contemplated in the report just read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Shall we not have the same additional clerks provided in any event?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; there will be no additional clerks called for.

Mr. HOLMAN. Undoubtedly there will be the same corps employed, whether we create this annual clerkship or not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This clerk is now required to attend to all the changes of reference, to all the reports, to all private bills and petitions referred; he is required to adjust and arrange all resolutions and memorials. This work, which last year went in another direction, is now thrown on his shoulders.

I wish to say that last Sabbath (and it is the first time since I have been in Congress that I have visited the building on that day of the week) I passed through the House and around to my committee room. In doing so I passed the office of the Journal Clerk. I found this man in there with his coat off and his sleeves up, at work. I said to him, "How is it you are compelled to violate the Sabbath day?" He said, "for want of help, and for want of time; I am obliged to work on the Sabbath, as well as at night." Now, you must either make that man an annual clerk, or you must hire help for him after Congress adjourns, letting the business lag, and bringing it up at the end of the session.

This is a question purely of economy, and I think my record here for economy is known sufficiently to the Democratic side of the House and to our friends on the other side to satisfy them that I would not support a proposition which contemplated a wasteful expenditure of the public money. I hope there will be no dissent in regard to the adoption of this resolution. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Accounts, a committee of your own selection, and you certainly can trust them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman from Indiana desire? The Chair will submit his request.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to submit brief remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If permitted, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and ask for tellers; perhaps in that way we can save time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is a misapprehension as to this proposition. The resolution which we are asked to adopt provides—

That the position of assistant journal clerk be made an annual position at the rate of $2,300 per annum; and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby instructed to make provision for such clerk in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill at the rate of $2,300 per annum.

That simply means an additional clerk for this House at $2,200 salary, without reference to the question who will do the work after Congress adjourns. The supposition of my friend from Georgia that any clerk of this House is hard pressed in his work is simply absurd, if the Clerk of the House faithfully performs his duties, as I believe he does. We all know that a superabundant number of clerks are employed by the House, and always have been. Besides, there will not be as much work to do at this session as there was in the corresponding session of the last Congress, and even a Republican House did not deem it necessary then to create this additional office.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will observe that the report says there is three times the amount of work to be done in this Congress than there was in the last.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must know that there is less work to be done at this session than at the corresponding session of the last Congress, because it will not be so long.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will understand that I do not make the statement, but the report does.

Mr. HOLMAN. Having already increased the number of employes of the House beyond what was ever known in its history it is proposed now to add another clerk to the list. We hold our seats here under pledges to our constituents that we will demand severe economy in the administration of the Government; and yet here in this House, where we have exclusive power to enforce economy, are we to show a determination to increase expenditures?

Mr. LIVINGSTONE. Does not the gentleman know that this is not a proposition to create an additional clerk, but to make one of the assistants an annual clerk?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the creation of an additional permanent clerk at $2,200 a year; and there is no provision here that will prevent the employment of a temporary clerk or any number of temporary clerks hereafter when Congress adjourns to perform the same duty. It is the creation of a new and permanent officer for the House, whereas if you say to your Clerk of the House of Representatives, the present Clerk, a very estimable gentleman, that of the clerical force now employed in the House on your permanent roll he shall require this work to be done after the adjournment of Congress, there will be no trouble or difficulty in having it done without additional expense, and without imposing any considerable labor upon these men, who are well paid.

But as proposed now you will go on, after you have made this a permanent employment, and then by resolution at the end of the session, for the purpose of bringing up the Journal, authorize the employment of temporary clerks to do the same work. The Clerk of the House should be held responsible for the performance of this duty. It should be made a part of his duty. He should be authorized to employ any number of your clerks, who are paid annually, after the adjournment of Congress, to bring up the Journal if it should be in arrears, and he will do it if you ask that it shall be done.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let me ask the gentleman if in his judgment the Clerk of the House has any authority to designate other work than that assigned by the rules for the clerks now employed on the annual roll?

Mr. HOLMAN. He can certainly intimate to the House what legislation is necessary for that purpose if he deems it necessary that such provision shall be made. If the law is not broad enough as it is the House can make it so. We should not indulge in extravagance because we need particular legislation. Legislation is cheap, and such attacks as this upon the public Treasury are not warranted by any such excuse as that. Besides, gentlemen, we are committed to our constituents, and to the people of this country, that there shall be rigid and necessary economy in public expenditures.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask if every other department except this has not an annual assistant clerk?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, you can hardly call this a department. Within a few years, gentlemen, you should remember that all of these duties have been performed by a single Journal Clerk.

It is a matter of recent years that this increase has been made by giving assistants to perform the work; and my friend will discover by an investigation of the subject that in just such ways as this the permanent force of the House has been steadily growing year after year until now we have a body of clerks far beyond the necessities of the service, in my judgment.

Mr. DICKERSON. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not know that in the previous Congresses bills were presented in open House, and the Reporters, in making up the RECORD, made their lists from them? The Journal Clerk then took his list from the RECORD and made it up for the Journal in that way. His work was not near so large as it is now; because this Congress requires all bills to be put into the box, and the list of such bills to be furnished to the RECORD, so that this additional work is put upon the Journal Clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. All of the bills and reports are published in the RECORD. In the last Congress all bills, memorials, and resolutions were handed to the Speaker and referred by him, and a list was made up by the Journal Clerk for the RECORD.

Mr. DICKERSON. But heretofore the Journal Clerk was enabled to get a list of these bills from the Reporters, whereas now he must make up the list for himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, there is no portion of the force here that is overworked now.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not know that up to this time last year only about 4,000 bills were introduced, whereas now over 8,000 have been submitted? The work on that man has been doubled this session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, employ temporary clerks if necessary, but until the necessity arises let us be careful how we increase the expenditures for employes of this House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The temporary employes cost more than the permanent ones.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think not. Their employment is limited. I ask the House to vote down the measure as an improvident and unnecessary one. It is not demanded by the needs of the public service, and against it we are absolutely pledged to our constituents.

Mr. DICKERSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to hold that making this employment annual, instead of temporary, would increase the cost?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. DICKERSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays and ask for tellers.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCKINNEY. If in order, Mr. Speaker, I ask that this resolution be read again, as I think there is a misunderstanding as to what it undertakes to accomplish.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. MOSES. I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the committee, to explain why we have reported this resolution. I ask only five minutes to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMPSON. I object, Mr. Speaker, and demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 66, not voting 150; as follows:

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House for leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. ARNOLD]. He is absent on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that leave has already been granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and that members of the several committees of the House be allowed to file any reports they have to present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks unanimous consent that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and that members having reports from committees be permitted to hand them to the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the Chair holds that it requires unanimous consent to now go into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. That question is not before the House. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent, and the House may by unanimous consent go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOUD. A parliamentary inquiry as to whether it requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That question it not up.

Mr. LOUD. I raise the question now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. LOUD. I should prefer not to object, sir, but I would like to know if it requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The House may do by unanimous consent whatever it desires, and without objection the request is agreed to, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] will take the chair.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, with Mr. OATES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment which is pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 14, 15, and 16 and insert:

"Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Venezuela, $7,500."

The CHAIRMAN. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Tellers had already been ordered on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The tellers

[Mr. HITT and Mr. BLOUNT] will take their places.

Mr. GEISSENHARNER. Mr. Chairman, what is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment, if there be no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The committee again divided; and during the count

Mr. BLOUNT said: Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. It is quite evident that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is also quite evident they do not intend to, either.

After further count, the tellers reported—ayes 9, noes 111.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will direct the Clerk to call the roll.

The committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.
Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, while proceeding found itself without a quorum. The Chair caused the roll to be called, and found that 204 gentlemen answered to their names as present. I report the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees will be entered upon the Journal. More than a quorum being present, the committee will resume its session; but, by unanimous consent, before doing so, the Chair will receive a message from the Senate.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6923) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes; in which concurrence was requested.

It also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 97) to fill vacancies which will occur in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on April 21, 1892.

It also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 3022) authorizing the Leavenworth and Platte County Bridge Company to sell, transfer, and assign to the Leavenworth Terminal Railway and Bridge Company the rights and franchises as granted by acts of Congress approved February 25 and March 2, 1889, and by act of Congress approved July 25, 1890; in which concurrence was requested.

It also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that Mr. SHERMAN has been appointed one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, in place of Mr. DAVIS, excused. Also, Mr. MORGAN in place of Mr. GRAY, excused.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers will resume their places.

Tellers resumed their places; the committee again divided, and tellers reported—ayes 10, noes 119.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not voting, the Chair will order the Clerk to call the roll again; and, as there is but one call, gentlemen will please pay attention.

Robinson, Pa.
Rusk,

The committee thereupon rose, and the Speaker resumed the Chair; when

Mr. OATES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, considering the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, having found itself without a quorum, the Chair had caused the roll to be called, pursuant to the rule, when 191 members answered to their names.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees will be entered on the Journal. One hundred and ninety-one members, more than a quorum, having answered to their names, the House will again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OATES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will resume their places as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 13, noes 130.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OATES, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that it had had under consideration the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and, finding itself without a quorum, had determined to rise, having come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn; and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 17, nays 187,

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] is on record. I make the inquiry because he and I have been absent from the Hall by leave of the House on the committee which is investigating assessments in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recorded.
Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SWEET] has been compelled to leave the Hall on account of illness. I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. RUSK with Mr. SWEET, for the rest of this day.

Mr. STEWART of Texas with Mr. CURTIS, for the rest of this day.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name was called?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I entered just after my name had been called.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the Chair can not entertain the gentleman's request.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas there are a large number of members absent from the House and the public business is delayed, the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to bring in all absentees; and the proceedings in connection therewith shall be in accordance with Rule XV in cases where a call of the House is ordered; and all leaves of absence are hereby revoked except for providential cause.

Mr. BLOUNT. On that resolution, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the gentleman demands the previous question I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARUTH. What is a providential cause? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that unless he modifies the terms of his resolution so as to except members who are absent by leave of the House, the direction to the Sergeant-at-Arms to "bring in all absentees" will compel him to bring in those who are absent with leave as well as those without leave.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly. That is exactly what I want. We are in a situation where we have to resort to unusual measures.

Mr. McMILLIN. I agree fully with the gentleman.

Mr. BERGEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BERGEN. I desire to know whether such action is proper on the part of the House unless it appear that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that a majority can send for absentees if they desire to do so.

Mr. BERGEN. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 2 of Rule XV, which seems to imply something else.

The SPEAKER. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is not offered under that rule. It is a resolution to send for absent members by a majority of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether or no it is competent for the House to order the arrest of absent members until there has been a call of the House under the rule, disclosing the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in the power of the majority of the House to send for absentees.

Mr. DINGLEY. And to arrest absent members?

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. DINGLEY. That must come entirely under the constitutional provision which authorizes—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is very plain.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have a ruling upon the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the majority of the House has the right, under the Constitution, to transact business, and it has the right to compel the attendance of absent members. But inasmuch as the Constitution provides that less than a quorum can not transact business, unless there was a special exception in the Constitution permitting less than a majority to send for absentees less than a majority could not do it.

The expression of the idea that less than a majority can send for absent members does not exclude the idea that a majority can transact business and can require the attendance of all members of the House in order to do so.

Mr. DINGLEY. I only raised the point in order to have a ruling of the Chair on the matter.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? Mr. MILLER. For the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand, the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] proposes to ensure for absence members who have been excused. Now, I do not think—

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the whole matter be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin move to lay the resolution on the table?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. MILLER. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. If the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia is to be adopted by the House, I desire to know how it can be ascertained, unless there is a call of the House, who are absent, and what sort of authority we are going to give the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest a member because he does not appear as voting upon a roll call on a motion to adjourn. There are gentlemen in this Hall who may not want to vote on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that is not a parliamentary question. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. HATCH. Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to modify my resolution.

Mr. HATCH. I think the gentleman ought first to make his motion for a call of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to modify the resolution.

Mr. MILLER. I insist on my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to modify the resolution so as not to cover the cases of members who are absent on leave.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. MILLER. I made a motion to lay on the table—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to obtain order. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not in order. He creates confusion by talking when the Chair is asking for order.

The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are a large number of members absent from the House, and the public business is delayed, the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to bring in all absentees without leave; and the proceedings in connection therewith shall be in accordance with Rule XV in cases where a call of the House is ordered; and all leaves of absence are hereby revoked except for providential causes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the previous question upon this resolution—

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will be seated and allow the Chair to state the question the Chair will be very much indebted to him. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to lay the resolution on the table; and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MILLER. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALDWELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. It seems to me that the resolution as just read is not the resolution which was read before and which the gentleman from Wisconsin moved to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman.

Mr. CALDWELL. The resolution which the gentleman from Georgia submitted was read some minutes ago. Then the gentleman from Wisconsin moved that it be laid on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays. Now, the gentleman from Georgia sends up another resolution—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand this to be another resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. The "gentleman from Georgia" was trying to get in his modification before the gentleman from Wisconsin made his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought this was the same resolution.

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir; it is not.

The SPEAKER. Wherein is there any difference.

Mr. CALDWELL. I submit that the motion to lay upon the table should be put upon the resolution as first offered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CALDWELL] does not understand the situation, though I have no doubt he thinks he is correct. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin made his motion I was seeking an opportunity to modify the resolution—trying to get the attention of the Chair.

Mr. CALDWELL. But the gentleman from Wisconsin did not consent to any modification.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Wisconsin was never recognized by the Chair at all.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, indeed, he was; I beg the gentleman's pardon; he was recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood—the House will please be in order—the Chair understood that the gentleman from Georgia submitted a resolution and demanded the previous question upon it, whereupon the gentleman from Wisconsin rose and moved to lay the resolution on the table. The Chair entertained that motion; whereupon the gentleman from Georgia said he desired to modify his resolution. The Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to modify the resolution unless the previous question is ordered.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair allow me to suggest that the right to modify it, after the motion to lay on the table was recognized by the Chair, is a question. That seems to be the difficulty in the way. After the Chair had recognized the motion to lay on the table it would scarcely be in order, it seems, to modify the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin to make the motion.

Mr. REED. I only offer it as a suggestion. I came in in the midst of the confusion, and do not know what motions were pending or their order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not altogether clear that the resolution could be modified pending the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow the resolution to be modified, and then he can submit his motion.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Georgia will have leave to modify the resolution, and then the question will be submitted on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

There was no objection.

Mr. BERGEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the parliamentary situation has been modified, and this is proposed to be done under Rule XV of the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolution provides for sending for absent members.

Mr. BERGEN. I know. But the Speaker will please remember that Rule XV provides, in the absence of a quorum, the House may compel the attendance of absent members. Now, there is no question but that a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's parliamentary question?

Mr. BERGEN. My parliamentary inquiry is this: When a quorum is developed in the House, and the rule prescribes that we can only bring in absent members when a quorum is required, and only in the absence of a quorum, how can it be proper under any rule of the House or any practice of the House to take the action that is proposed here?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has held that the House has at all times the right to demand the presence of its members; and that is the question now pending, which the gentleman from Wisconsin moves to lay on the table.

Mr. BERGEN. But does not the resolution itself specify that the action shall be taken under Rule XV, which refers to a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the rule provides that under the execution of the present order of the House conformity shall be had to the practice in cases where a call of the House is ordered. That is as the Chair understands the resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will make a further slight modification in the resolution.

Mr. REED. Perhaps if the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw the demand for the previous question he could get this in shape after awhile.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia submits a further modification.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I ask that the resolution be reported as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, there are a large number of members absent from the House, and the public business is delayed, the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to bring in all absentees without leave; and the proceedings in connection therewith shall be in accordance with Rule XV in cases where a call of the House is ordered. Leaves of absence are hereby revoked, except for providential causes; and the roll shall be immediately called to ascertain what members are absent.

Mr. BLOUNT. Upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he also incorporate in the resolution the words: "whereas a large number of members are present and refuse to vote," so that both cases may appear.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded, and pending that the gentleman from Wisconsin moves to lay on the table the resolution. Under the rule the first vote will be taken on that motion.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that motion is not insisted on.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on a demand for the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURROWS) there were—ayes 134, noes 3.

Mr. BURROWS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves a call of the House.

Mr. BURROWS. But, Mr. Speaker, what becomes of the other proposition?

The SPEAKER. On the other question there was no quorum. The House can not proceed without a quorum.

Mr. BURROWS. That is correct.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Alderson,	Dunphy,	Magner,	Sanford,
Amernan,	Durborow,	Mansur,	Scott,
Arnold,	Ellis,	McDonald,	Shonk,

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The names of the absentees will be called for excuses.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Clerk has recorded me as present or not. I should be recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the names of all gentlemen called who are noted as absent, and they can respond on this call if present.

The Clerk proceeded to again call the roll.

Mr. REILLY (when the name of Mr. AMERMAN was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. AMERMAN] is absent from the House by reason of sickness. He was sick in this city for several weeks, and becoming worse, was obliged to go home, where he now is, confined by illness. I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY] asks that his colleague, Mr. AMERMAN, be excused on account of sickness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAPEHART (when the name of Mr. ALDERSON was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. ALDERSON] is absent from the House on account of sickness, and I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. CAPEHART] states that his colleague, Mr. ALDERSON, is absent on account of sickness, and asks that he be excused. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS (when the name of Mr. ARNOLD was called). Mr. Speaker, this morning I asked leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. ARNOLD] on account of important business. He is now in Missouri, and I again ask leave for him for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that leave had been granted.

Mr. BYRNS. He was granted leave of absence, but it expires to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BYRNS] asks leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. ARNOLD, for two weeks on account of important business. Is there objection?

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know if the gentleman is in the city?

Mr. TARSNEY. He is not in the city.

Mr. HATCH. My colleague [Mr. ARNOLD] is in Missouri, absent by leave of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. His leave expired to-day, and his business is not yet finished.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman has been absent for some time, and I understand his leave expires to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not object if the gentleman has gone away by leave of the House?

There was no objection.

Mr. McRAE. (When the name of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. And he is in Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. A member who is absent by leave of the House would not be sent for unless that order should be made by the House.

Mr. MARTIN (when the name of Mr. BRETZ was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. BRETZ] is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina (when the name of Mr. COWLES was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. COWLES] is absent in North Carolina by leave of the House, I understand, on account of sickness in his family. If his leave has expired, I wish to ask that it be extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has indefinite leave of absence.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina (when the name of Mr. BUNN was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. BUNN] has been here all day, but he has been feeling very unwell, and he is absent from the House now on account of sickness. I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE (when the name of Mr. CRAIN of Texas was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. CRAIN of Texas] be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS (when the name of Mr. DALZELL was called). Mr. Speaker, I am requested to announce that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was called away yesterday. He started for the House this morning and will be here at 5 o'clock. I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL (when the name of Mr. ENOCHS was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. ENOCHS] is on his way here and will be here to-morrow morning. I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. CUMMINGS (when the name of Mr. GEISSENHAINER was called). Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GEISSENHAINER] is on his way to New York on duties connected with the special immigration investigation committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has leave.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Virginia (when the name of Mr. LAWSON of Virginia was called). My colleague [Mr. LAWSON of Virginia] is at his home sick, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COOMBS (when the name of Mr. MAGNER was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. MAGNER] is at home sick. I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY (when the name of Mr. MILLIKEN was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. MILLIKEN], who has been called home, be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. GOODNIGHT (when the name of Mr. PAYNTER was called). My colleague [Mr. PAYNTER] has been called home with his family to Kentucky. He is paired with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILSON], and will be back on Monday. I ask that he be excused until then.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. On what ground?

Mr. GOODNIGHT. He has gone to Kentucky to take his family home. He will be back on Monday.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But did he get leave of the House?

Mr. GOODNIGHT. He is paired with his colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But did he get leave of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is excused for this day's session.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania (when the name of Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania was called). My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania] has had leave of absence granted him. He is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SWEET was called). The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SWEET] is absent. I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has been excused.

Mr. CUMMINGS (when the name of Mr. STUMP was called). Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. STUMP] is also absent with the immigration investigation committee by special order of the House to investigate into alleged irregularities at Ellis Island.

Mr. BACON (when the name of Mr. BENTLEY was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. BENTLEY] is absent from the city, having been compelled to go home to take care of his family. I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has leave.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]. I have been in my committee room all day at work, and did not know there was a call of the House on hand or I would have come in sooner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recorded as present. Mr. CUMMINGS (when the name of Mr. WRIGHT was called). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] is also a member of that immigration investigating committee, and is absent in New York, by special order of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The resolution (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes) was agreed to. At 4 o'clock and 25 minutes

Mr. MILLER said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether there is any way to ascertain where these absent members are; whether they are in the city proper or not, and if they are not I can not see why we should remain here.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms has been directed to arrest absent members, and the Chair supposes he will make a report as soon as he finds out where they are. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. About what time will he make a report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is uncertain about that.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was rejected.

So the House refused to adjourn.

At 4 o'clock and 40 minutes

Mr. BAILEY said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if it is in order to offer a resolution designed to facilitate the call of the House? If so, I desire to offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, instructed to deduct from the monthly payment of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he is absent, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as a reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

[Cries of "Ah!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up the resolution, and the Chair will have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, instructed to deduct from the monthly payment of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he is absent, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as a reason for such absence sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman had better amend his resolution so as to have it operate only after this date.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that it would not be retroactive any way.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It would act upon those who are now absent by leave of the House.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman had better strike out the Delegates.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no. That is the law now.

Mr. ALLEN. Would it not be better just to pass a resolution to enforce the existing law?

Mr. BAILEY. That is what this is, practically.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Let it apply also to members who are in the House and do not vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. BERGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this resolution is not in order during proceedings in the nature of a call of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution which I have sent to the desk is designed to aid in executing the resolution which we have already adopted to arrest and bring in absent members.

The SPEAKER. It may help to keep them here after they are brought in, but the point made is that it is not in order as a part of the proceedings to secure the attendance of members of the House. As the Chair understands the rulings made in the past upon this point, when the House is in call nothing is in order except such motions as may further the purposes of the call, to wit, the securing of a quorum. As the Chair recollects, it has been held by his predecessors that a motion to revoke leaves of absence was in order during a call, upon the theory that such action would further the obtaining of a quorum.

The Chair understands the gentleman to say that the resolution is a copy of the existing law. Is that all it is?

Mr. BAILEY. It is practically the very language of the statute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not clear that this resolution is in order pending the call.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, to relieve the Chair of all embarrassment upon this question, I will withdraw the resolution now, giving notice that I shall offer it again on the first opportunity, and insist upon its adoption.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That all leaves of absence heretofore granted and unexpired, except such as are granted on account of sickness or sickness in the Member's family, be, and the same are hereby, revoked.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLOUNT. On that I ask the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. You have already got that, substantially.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question, and the Speaker declared that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 9.

Mr. CALDWELL. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum. The previous question is ordered. The question now is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FYAN, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness.

PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE CALL.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That, except as to the revocation of leaves of absence and the arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms of absent members of the House as heretofore ordered, all further proceedings under the call of the House be, and the same are hereby, dispensed with.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, has the House, under its rules, power to dispense in part with proceedings taken in part?

The SPEAKER. In the second session of the Twenty-seventh Congress it was held that by an adjournment pending a call of the House all proceedings under the call were terminated unless the House had previously passed an order specially directing otherwise. By referring to the Journal of the Twenty-seventh Congress the Chair finds that a resolution was adopted which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all such members of the House as have not appeared in pursuance of the call of the House and given satisfactory excuses shall be fined the amount of the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms, subject to be released from the payment of the same on appearing hereafter and making such excuse as shall be deemed satisfactory to the House.

The SPEAKER. That resolution was adopted pending the proceedings under the call of the House, and afterwards the House adjourned. That order is the predicate of the statement in the Manual as to an adjournment dispensing with proceedings under the call except where the House had otherwise ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. If this resolution be adopted, what will be its effect upon the members of the House who may have been arrested and who are now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that it must be competent for the House in the present situation to continue the order of arrest notwithstanding an adjournment. A recess can not be taken—

A MEMBER. Why?

The SPEAKER. Because the roll call has shown the presence of less than a quorum, a call of the House has been ordered, and a motion for a recess is not in order pending a call of the House. If an adjournment dispenses necessarily (notwithstanding the desire of the House to the contrary) with all proceedings under the call, including the order for the arrest of absent members, then if the House wanted to send for a member, say in Texas, it would have to stay in session until the Sergeant-at-Arms could go there and return; the House could not adjourn without causing the proceedings to fall, and could not take a recess in the absence of a quorum. So that it seems to the Chair it must be in the power of a minority of the House, when a call has been entered upon, to adopt a resolution to continue the order of arrest and then to adjourn, the Constitution contemplating that less than a quorum may adjourn from day to day, and may also enforce the attendance of absent members. It seems therefore to the Chair that this resolution is in order.

Mr. DICKERSON. Could we not have a recount of the members here to ascertain whether there is not a quorum actually in the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no provision for that, though doubtless there is more than a quorum here—very much more.

Mr. DICKERSON. I move a call of the names.

The SPEAKER. There is no provision for that. A call of the House is pending. The gentleman can move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. DICKERSON. Well, I think I will make that motion.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the resolution be again read.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, except as to the revocation of leaves of absence and the arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms of absent members of the House as heretofore ordered, all further proceedings under the call of the House be, and the same are hereby, dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to this resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to make a motion to recommit the bill now pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman's motion.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the bill is not in the House. It has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and a motion to recommit would not be in order until the bill has been reported back to the House.

Mr. MALLORY. We are now in the House, not in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. We are in the House, but the bill is in Committee of the Whole. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER and Mr. BURROWS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE CALL OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the House to the fact that on yesterday the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to arrest and bring before the bar of the House certain of its members who were absent without leave. Pending the execution of the order the House adjourned, after directing that the order should continue in force. The Chair will now call upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to make a report of the proceedings under the order of arrest.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. The Chair will state that this is a question of the highest privilege—a question pertaining to members now under arrest.

Mr. OWENS. It relates to this very matter, and, under Rule IX, it is clearly one of the questions of privilege on which I have a right to be heard, because the rights of members individually are concerned; and I hope that—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is interrupting a question of privilege.

Mr. OWENS. I hope the Chair will hear me on this subject. I am satisfied that this matter of desiring to arraign these men and bring them in is all wrong, and that the Speaker, if fully informed about the matter, will revise his opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on any question, but there is no question of that sort before the House. The House ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest absent members.

Mr. OWENS. But the House had no authority, and that is the question of privilege that I desire to be heard on.

The SPEAKER. It is a question over which the Chair has no control.

Mr. OWENS. The House did not do anything of the kind—that is to say, now I speak from the RECORD—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand what the gentleman's point is.

Mr. OWENS. The point is that it is a question of the right of individual members. When the House adjourned last night, by all the precedents there was no authority, and is no authority, to bring anyone in here now at this time.

The SPEAKER. That question will arise when the Sergeant-at-Arms makes his report and the House has to deal with the question.

Mr. OWENS. I hope then to be heard on that subject as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the Chair will hear the gentleman. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make report of what action he has taken on the warrant placed in his hands yesterday by order of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have order.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentlemen who are not under arrest will be required to take their seats.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

The ASSISTANT SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Mr. Speaker, of the nineteen members whose names were certified by the Clerk as being absent without leave and given to me in connection with the warrant, I have the following report to make:

Mr. WEVER and Mr. GILLESPIE I failed to find, although I tried.

Mr. CLANCY, Mr. COVERT, Mr. FITCH, and Mr. LODGE, as I learned, are absent from the city. Mr. CHEATHAM left last night for his home in North Carolina, on account of a severe accident to his son.

The following members—all the others—Mr. BOWERS, Mr. DUNPHY, Mr. ELLIS, Mr. HARTER, Mr. HEMPHILL, Mr. McDONALD, Mr. MEREDITH, Mr. PICKLER, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. STACKHOUSE, Mr. TRACEY, and Mr. WARWICK, I notified, and they all said they would be here this morning except Mr. MEREDITH, and one of the other officers had notified him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms appealed to him last evening to know what action he should take when he executed the warrants by notifying or arresting members, and the Chair perhaps assumed the authority to say to him—at all events the Chair did say to him—to simply tell the gentlemen that they would please to report here this morning, which action was taken, and the Sergeant-at-Arms now makes his report. It is for the House to determine what it will do in the premises.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] is desirous to raise a point upon this, and the Chair will hear him.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I find in the RECORD of yesterday, on page 3761—

A MEMBER. Has the report been made?

The SPEAKER. The report has been made, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] rises to a question of privilege relating to the report, as the Chair understands.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I find on page 3761 of the RECORD that reference is made by the Speaker of the House to the Journal of the Twenty-seventh Congress, in which the Speaker found that a resolution was adopted, which was then read. I have this morning examined that record, and find that that sort of resolution, the same as one passed yesterday, was passed then, but no action was ever taken on it. No one was ever arraigned under that resolution. That was in the Twenty-seventh Congress. I find in the Twenty-ninth Congress, on page 60, which was at a later date—

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the question?

Mr. BUSHNELL. That there is really no question before the House. That is, I do not understand that there is any issue. The Sergeant-at-Arms has made a report, and the rules, I submit, prescribe the proper course to pursue; and that until there is some issue presented, and the House has gone to the extent of taking some action, thereby raising some issue, there is nothing properly before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] stated that he rose to a question respecting the call. The Chair does not know what the question is.

Mr. BLAND. There is no resolution or proposition before the House.

The SPEAKER. None whatever.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman seems to be arraigning the action of the House on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. What is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS]?

Mr. OWENS. For the information of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], I say that this resolution ought to be expunged from the RECORD:

Resolved, That, except as to the revocation of leaves of absence and the arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms of absent members of the House as heretofore ordered, all further proceedings under the call of the House be, and the same are hereby, dispensed with.

Now, then, these men are brought in here under that resolution, and I say there is no precedent, and can not be one shown by any member of this House for such a proceeding in any former Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the question was raised yesterday, passed upon yesterday by the Chair, and the House accepted that decision and adopted the resolution.

Mr. OWENS. The House was then without a quorum.

Mr. DOCKERY. And it passed it without objection.

Mr. OWENS. It was without a quorum. The House without a quorum is not the House. Then the Chair declared, on page 3760, on the other question, there was no quorum. The House can not proceed without a quorum, but the resolution was passed without a quorum, and that action is not the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the express question raised by the gentleman from Ohio was determined yesterday. The point was made that it was incompetent for a minority of the House to continue this order. The House acted on the point when made yesterday.

Mr. OWENS. The House has not acted on it. It appears that a few members here, under a call of the House, without a quorum, have passed the resolution which appears in the RECORD, and which is now sought to be put into execution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to execute the order of the House.

Mr. DICKERSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call and the order for the arrest of members be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will be competent to discharge members under arrest.

Mr. FUNSTON. I raise the point that all further proceedings under the call of the House were dispensed with when the House adjourned.

Mr. OWENS and others addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is no confusion about the matter. The Chair held on yesterday, after argument, that a minority of the House, under a call of the House, had the right to send for absent members, and to continue the order, although the House adjourned.

Mr. OWENS. And it passed that resolution.

The SPEAKER. And that resolution was passed.

Mr. OWENS. That presents a privileged question, as to the rights of members, and on that I desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The right of what member?

Mr. OWENS. The right of every member who was brought in here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not hear the gentleman on that question.

Mr. DICKERSON. I move that members under arrest be discharged and that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. OWENS. And on this I desire to quote—

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. Will the Clerk read the resolution adopted yesterday?

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are a large number of members absent from the House—

The SPEAKER. That is not the resolution. The Clerk will read the resolution continuing the order for arrest.

Mr. OWENS. It is on that subject that I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not hear the gentleman on that point. When a gentleman is arrested and brought before the House, if the gentleman makes the point that the House has no power for its action, then the Chair can hear him.

Mr. OWENS. Then I accept it in that way; that the House had no power, and that the House did not act in that matter.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that we have the order read, and I think that will shed light on and show what the situation is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That except as to the revocation of leaves of absence, and the arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms of absent members of the House, as heretofore ordered, all further proceedings under the call of the House be, and the same are hereby, dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That is the order of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. The exception from dispensing with the further proceedings under the call having been made as indicated there, is not this the situation: That the members who were brought in by the Sergeant-at-Arms to-day are to be held as fully under arrest under that resolution as they would be if they had been brought in here yesterday evening?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, and the Chair was proposing to have the list of those gentlemen called and let them come forward and give their excuses. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] seems to think that he has a point of order which the Chair ought to hear, and the Chair would like to hear it if the gentleman will state it.

Mr. OWENS. The point is that the House after adjournment has no right to bring in members under a call after an adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is going behind the record of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether it is not in order to move that members under arrest be discharged by the House?

The SPEAKER. The rule has always been that when members are arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms they are brought to the bar of the House and the Chair says to them: "Mr. Jones, or Mr. Brown, or whatever the name may be, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without leave; what excuse have you to offer?" Whereupon the member offers his excuse if he has one.

Mr. DICKERSON. But when we deal with them individually, does not the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms bring those gentlemen before the House, and, assuming that that report is made, are they not now before the House?

The SPEAKER. We have not yet reached the point where excuses or motions to relieve are in order.

Mr. BLAND. They have a right to give their excuses.

Mr. DICKERSON. Does not the Chair assume that if the Sergeant-at-Arms makes a return of an arrest the member, theoretically at least, is actually in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and can not the House deal with the member upon that theory?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that each of these members has the right to state the reasons why he was absent. The Chair asks each member what excuse he has to offer, and if the gentleman has a good excuse, or what he regards as a good excuse, he has a right to state it and put it upon record.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio rises to a point of order in relation to this matter.

Mr. OWENS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the resolution referred to by the Chair yesterday as having been passed in the Twenty-seventh Congress—

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The confusion is so great that it is impossible to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] please state what his point or his motion is?

Mr. OWENS. It is a question of privilege. The point I make is that the House has no right to arraign these men here at all; and it is a question of the highest privilege; a question affecting the rights and reputations of members of the House in their representative capacity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not pass upon that question now, because the House has ordered them to be arrested.

Mr. OWENS. But the Chair is attempting now, as I understand it, under what is understood by the Chair to be the rule of the House, to arraign these men before the bar of the House, and I make the point that that is not proper under the rules, and upon that I desire to be heard.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman [Mr. OWENS] is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of course willing to hear any gentleman on a question affecting a proceeding like this, and the Chair will be glad if the gentleman from Ohio will direct the attention of the Chair to any particular rule or principle governing the matter; but the gentleman appears to be going behind the action of the House on yesterday. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. OWENS. If the House will be in order I shall get through in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. OWENS. The Speaker referred yesterday to a resolution like this which was passed in the Twenty-seventh Congress. Now, in the Thirtieth Congress—

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire a ruling on my point. My point is that the gentleman is out of order, because these matters were disposed of yesterday. The point that he is making now was made yesterday and the House disposed of it, and it is not in order to make it again now.

Mr. OWENS. My friend from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] seems to know more about the rules than the Chair does.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] claims that he can point to some authority which may control this matter, and the Chair would like to hear him.

Mr. OWENS. In the Thirtieth Congress this same question came up. The Speaker of that House then stated that it had been uniformly decided that an adjournment suspends all proceedings under a call of the House.

Mr. CARUTH. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. OWENS. From the eighteenth volume of the Congressional Globe; and exactly the same thing is repeated in the Twenty-ninth Congress. I undertake to say that never in the history of legislative proceedings until the present case were members who had been absent brought in under arrest under a call of the House after an adjournment of the House had taken place. I do not care to elaborate this point, because there seems to be a good deal of disorder on the floor of the House; and I am inclined to think it comes largely from men who were at the horse races yesterday and who would better have been here.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a point of order. There is so much confusion we can not hear.

The SPEAKER. The question raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] was passed upon yesterday by the Chair, the decision was acquiesced in by the House, and the order for arrest was continued. The Clerk will call the names of the gentlemen who have been arrested, and as they are called they will please come forward.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BERGEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BERGEN. I wish to inquire whether the present situation is not analogous to that which exists at common law when an arrest has been made and the sheriff has suffered the person arrested to go at large? In that case the sheriff can not rearrest the person and bring him into court. Have we not an analogous situation here? The Sergeant-at-Arms having allowed these members to go at large, are they not now relieved from arrest?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DICKERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I attempted to make a motion that all these parties who are now here under this order of arrest be discharged. I desire to know whether it is in order to make that motion upon the theory that it is within the power of the House to withdraw absolutely its charge against these members as having been absent without leave and in violation of the rules. Can we not, by a general order of this kind, completely exculpate each and every one of them from the charge; and would such an order interfere with their individual right to make such explanation as they might deem proper? In brief, has not the House the right to withdraw its charge against these members? Would not that be the effect of the motion I have indicated, and would that motion be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the practice of the House each member must be called and render his own excuse, the House then taking action on his particular case.

Mr. DICKERSON. Certainly; but can not the House treat the matter collectively and withdraw its charge? I submit the proposition in good faith to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows no precedent for any such motion as that. The matter is perfectly plain under the rules. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BERGEN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain no motion until the order of the House has been executed.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I ask that the space in front of the desk be cleared so that we may know what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order. The Clerk will call the names of the gentlemen who have been arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and they will come forward as their names are called.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a point of order. There is so much conversation on the floor that we can not understand what business is going on. I ask that members take their seats.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the names of the members who have been arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and they will please come forward.

The Clerk called the names of Mr. BOWERS, Mr. DUNPHY, Mr. ELLIS, Mr. HARTER, Mr. HEMPHILL, Mr. McDONALD, Mr. MEREDITH, Mr. PICKLER, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. STACKHOUSE, Mr. TRACEY, and Mr. WARWICK.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BOWERS, during the sitting of the House you have been absent without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I have several excuses to offer. A MEMBER. Turn round this way.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, with your consent I will face my jury.

In my brief life of something near fifty-eight years I have learned that all crimes committed against the law and the gospel can be reduced to one; that is, getting caught. [Laughter.] I am one of the unfortunates who were caught yesterday. I was present at the opening of the session; I remained here until 2 o'clock; then the consular and diplomatic bill was under discussion; and I supposed that was a battle of giants, in which I could take no part. [Laughter.] I knew that at home, lying on my table, were one hundred and fifty letters from old soldiers; from people who want post-offices [laughter]; from some who do not want others to have post-offices; from some who want to be appointed Indian agents and want to know why they are not appointed, and why "the other fellow" has not been turned out. Out of my respect for this august body I carried up to the desk a little notice asking leave of absence for the balance of the day, and handed it to the Speaker, and told the Clerk I was going home.

I went home, sir, and went to work with my two clerks, and in the course of the afternoon we wrote about twenty-five letters to constituents. About 5 o'clock one of the assistants of the Sergeant-at-Arms came to my house and invited me to take a ride. [Laughter.] Just at that time, Mr. Speaker, I had opened a letter from one of the old soldiers in my district who wanted me to go down to Norfolk and see if I could not hunt up certain evidence with regard to his claim. [Laughter.] I had just concluded an answer to that, informing him that I could not go. Afterwards, when I found what was going on up here, I began to think that perhaps I had made a mistake and that I had better have gone [laughter] and in that manner escaped arrest.

But to be brief, because I do not want to occupy the time of the House unnecessarily, I have had at no time any intention to disobey the rules of this House. I believe, Mr. Speaker, if you will look at my record you will find that I have been as constant and regular an attendant on the sessions of the House as any member before me. I looked at a paper this morning and found that of the list of absentees on yesterday that there were sixty-six Democrats and thirty-four Republicans, making an even hundred absent from the House. Now, gentlemen, I am perfectly willing to obey all of the rules of the House as near as you all do on the average. I am perfectly willing to be judged by all of the members of this House who have not been guilty of the same offense that I have been day after day; in fact, by those who have been guilty of the same offense; that includes all of you. I admit that there were a certain number of gentlemen, members, away yesterday when this call was made.

I admit that it is proper for this House to compel the attendance of its absent members. I am perfectly willing to take my chances and go along with the rest. I have done exactly as you would have done, have done, you who are to judge me. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that I was attending to the business for which I was sent here by my constituents. I was answering their letters, attending to their requests from all parts of the district to the best of my ability at the time that the Sergeant-at-Arms came to my room; and he can testify that I was at my desk engaged in this business. If he had happened a day or two before he would probably have found me at the horse race, but not at this time. That is all I have to say.

The SPEAKER. What is the pleasure of the House?

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question. He says that the House was engaged in discussion on yesterday when he left the House on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. Will he state who was engaged in the discussion?

Mr. BOWERS. Well, Mr. BLOUNT of Georgia, I think, was one, if I remember.

Mr. OATES. What was the subject of the discussion?

Mr. BOWERS. The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill had been called up.

Mr. OATES. I think the gentleman will not find that anybody was engaged in the discussion of that bill.

Mr. BOWERS. Well, it was called up and was before the House.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The SPEAKER proceeded to submit the question.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, a word before that.

The SPEAKER. But the House is dividing.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I want to say, that for a Republican the gentleman has offered a very good excuse, but I do not think it would be good for a Democrat.

The question having been taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to prevail.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. If we are going to do this thing at all let us do it right. I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. LIVINGSTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 53, not voting 152; as follows:

Mr. BRAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the hall of the House and listening, and did he fail to hear his name called?

Mr. BRAWLEY. I was in the House, but was called to the door for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Of course if the gentleman was in the House during the call, and failed to hear his name, the Chair can have it called again.

Mr. BRAWLEY. I was called to the door for a moment. My name was called just as I was entering, but I was unaware of it.

Mr. AMERMAN with Mr. RIFE.

Mr. CAUSEY with Mr. SWEET.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. I may be in error, but I think that some of the gentlemen who are reported as under arrest voted on this call. I make the point of order that no member under arrest can vote upon this proposition, and if any such member did vote, such vote should be excluded from the roll.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see, as a question of fact, whether they did vote or not.

Mr. BLAND. The right to vote, Mr. Speaker, is a constitutional right, of which a member can not be deprived.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] submits a question of fact, and the Chair will ascertain whether any of the members referred to did vote. The Chair has not passed upon the question. [After consulting the Clerk.] The Chair is informed that some of the gentlemen have voted. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] will please state his point again.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood that several of these gentlemen voted, and I make the point of order that members under arrest can not participate in the proceedings of the House until they are relieved from such arrest. It has been held that members under arrest can not even be recognized by the Chair to debate a proposition. It has been so held frequently and I believe uniformly.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to say that it has been held that gentlemen can not vote under such circumstances?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman refer to any authority on that subject?

Mr. MEREDITH. I desire to say that I voted, but I do not consider that I am under arrest. I did not vote in my own case.

Mr. BLAND. The House may provide rules under which members may vote, but it can not provide any rule to prevent them from voting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is endeavoring to find some authority on the question, which the Chair would like to hear.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I can not at this moment turn to the authority, but I have no question about the practice. I have seen it stated, and it has been universally held, so far as I know, that where members are under arrest they can take no part in the proceedings until relieved of such arrest. I have here, for instance, a case where the Speaker declined to recognize a gentleman in his place who was under arrest, and he was not permitted to debate the proposition then before the House or to say anything until he was relieved from arrest. I submit the point of order that a member of the House under arrest is not permitted to vote or to take part in the proceedings until he is relieved of that disability.

The question arose in the Thirtieth Congress, and the Chair will pardon me if I read briefly from the record:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia being one of the gentlemen in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Chair can not recognize him. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Lincoln, remarking that he believed he was still a member, moved the previous question.

Mr. Venable inquired of the Chair whether the gentlemen in custody were entitled to vote upon this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that they are not entitled to vote. Mr. Pettit of Indiana rose and addressed the Chair, and the Speaker said, The Chair can not recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Because of the fact that he was under arrest.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman read what question it was they could not vote upon.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY. I wish to call the gentleman's attention first to section 1 of Rule VIII:

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Now, if a member is personally interested in a question, that member can not be allowed to vote. But it seems to me that the fact that other members are under arrest should not prevent them from voting in this case.

Mr. BURROWS. This is not a question of excusing a member who is personally interested in the proposition. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] asked me how the question arose in the case cited, and, if the Chair will pardon me, I will read in extenso from the record:

The Speaker announced that, agreeably to the order of the House of last evening, the Sergeant-at-Arms had notified the absentees—

That is like this proceeding—and that he now reported the names of fifty-two members under arrest.

Mr. Hudson rose to a privileged question. It was well known that by a vote of the House the Sergeant-at-Arms had been directed to bring the absentees before the House this morning.

And this bears on the other point, about which there has been some question as to whether an order can be made to dispense with all further proceedings under a call, except to bring in the absentees. That was held in this instance to be in order [continuing the reading]:

He had witnessed several such scenes, and his observation had convinced him that the arrests generally fell on the younger members.

The Speaker interposed and requested the gentleman to state his motion.

Mr. Hudson would move to reconsider the vote by which the Sergeant-at-Arms had been ordered to arrest the absentees.

The Speaker decided the motion out of order, as the order of the House had already been executed.

Mr. Hudson moved then to dispense with any further proceeding in the call, and that those gentlemen who had been fined have their fines remitted.

The Speaker stated that motion to be in order.

Then follows what I read before.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia—

This was Mr. Botts, who had moved the previous question upon the proposition—being one of the gentlemen in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Chair can not recognize him.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Now, will the gentleman allow me only one question there?

Mr. BURROWS. No, not until I have finished the reading [continuing the reading]:

Mr. Lincoln, remarking that he believed he was still a member, moved the previous question.

The Speaker announced the question upon dispensing with further proceedings in the case and remitting the fines imposed yesterday.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. Venable inquired of the Chair whether the gentlemen in custody were entitled to vote upon this question.

To relieve them of their fines and dispense with further proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that they are not entitled to vote. Mr. Pettit rose and addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at a place in his reading in which it would have a bearing upon the question?

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman will allow me to go on.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman is reading the very point that I want to refer to.

Mr. BURROWS. No, I can not now. [Reading.]

The Speaker said he would now state to the House that, agreeably to parliamentary precedents, the Clerk would proceed with the roll and call all the members of the House, and on making up the returns the names of those on the list of absentees would be omitted in case they answered.

Mr. Henley also rose, and said he desired to put a question to the Chair. The Speaker said he could not recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. Henley was one of the absentees.

Mr. Henley, with some warmth, insisted that he had the rights of a member on this floor; he had the same rights as any other member on this floor, and he again insisted that the Chair should recognize him.

The Speaker rose, and stated that this whole proceeding was supposed to be with closed doors. By strict right the gentlemen under arrest—those who were absent yesterday—were not entitled to be in their seats this morning. They should be in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and be admitted when called upon to give their excuses.

Mr. HENLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my question. [Loud calls of "Order!"]

The Speaker again said he could not recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. Henley, with great warmth, insisted that the Chair should recognize him. [Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will take the gentleman from Indiana into custody.

He was then in the House.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then proceeded to the gentleman from Indiana, and took him into custody, and they left the House together. Mr. Henley, however, was not kept in close confinement, for he soon after returned and remained outside the bar until permitted to give his excuse, he having given the Sergeant-at-Arms his parole.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, that covers the point I desire to make.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Who was the Speaker?

Mr. BURROWS. This volume does not disclose who was Speaker at that time. It was in 1848. [After a pause.] I find Mr. Winthrop was Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] if the Speaker gave any reason for his decision? That was a motion in which these gentlemen were all interested. It was a motion to excuse practically fifty at one time. Each one of them was a party specially interested in the motion.

Mr. BURROWS. I think I have made plain my proposition, which is, that a member of this House who is under arrest can not participate in the proceedings of the House or vote until relieved of the disability in some way. He can not certainly vote on his own case.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair permit me a suggestion? Now the Speaker does give a reason. Every man, or every member under arrest, is not considered to be upon the floor of the House, and therefore can not vote. That is the reason which the Speaker gives.

And though I am unable to refer to the exact time, I have a very strong impression that Mr. Colfax while Speaker of the House made a like decision.

Mr. BLAND. But the fact is that these gentlemen are present here on the floor of the House and taking part in the proceedings. Some of them have addressed the House. The Sergeant-at-Arms reported the names of the members and surrendered them to the House, and the Speaker was proceeding to call the list as reported by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and one of those gentlemen has already addressed the House stating his excuse. Therefore they are here and are being called upon to give excuses for their absence. They are not under arrest, and it can not properly be claimed, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] claims, that they are under arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms, when in fact they are present in the House and when the Speaker calls upon them by name to give their excuses. I do not know what the practice may have been, but it seems to me that where gentlemen are brought in by the Sergeant-at-Arms and are called upon by the Speaker to state their excuses, it would be an extraordinary thing, on a motion to excuse one of them who is present, to deny to such members their constitutional right to vote upon the pending question.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from Missouri has not misunderstood me. I did not give that reason. I only cited it as the reason given by Speaker Winthrop. It seemed to me a sound reason, but it was the Speaker's reason, not mine.

Mr. BLAND. Then the gentleman from Maine disclaims indorsing that reason?

Mr. REED. On the contrary, I indorse it. But I gave it, not as my reason, but as the reason assigned by Speaker Winthrop.

Mr. BLAND. Well, the reason given by Speaker Winthrop does not apply here, because these gentlemen are present, and some of them have addressed the House; while in that case the Speaker proceeded upon the idea that the members in question were in custody and were not present.

Mr. REED. The gentlemen were present, but the Speaker said the reason why they should not vote was that they had no right to be present, being in charge of an officer of the House.

Mr. BLAND. If members have no right to be present in such a case they can not give their excuses.

Mr. REED. They can, when called upon by the House—

Mr. BLAND. Then they are acting in their representative capacity.

Mr. REED (continuing). But unless called upon by the House, they can not take part in the proceedings when under arrest.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman from Maine answer a question?

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I want to ask the gentleman from Maine whether in his opinion it would be proper to count these gentlemen who are under arrest to make a quorum? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. The inquiry of the gentleman from New York gives me an opportunity to say that all this trouble arises from a neglect of the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.] These members could be counted as soon as they are excused, one by one, and there would be no trouble whatever about it. All this fuss and difficulty arises from an attempt to override the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. REED. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McMILLIN. On the question of overriding the Constitution.

Mr. REED. On the question of overriding the Constitution in this way.

Mr. McMILLIN? I want to know if the gentleman who makes this point of order and a number of other gentlemen on that side did not abstain from voting all day yesterday.

Mr. REED. The members on the other side are present under the laws and the Constitution of the United States to constitute a quorum and are ready to be counted for that purpose, as is their duty under the Constitution. As for voting, as I have heard gentlemen upon the other side say many times, that is an affair between themselves and their constituents. [Laughter.] I hope you have not forgotten those remarks, gentlemen.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would say to my friend from Maine that he is more likely to have forgotten them than I am, since he has suffered more.

Mr. REED. I have not suffered very much.

Mr. McMILLIN. The country has not suffered either.

Mr. REED. I have not suffered very much. It is, of course, disagreeable to have gentlemen noisy and unruly, but then one can get along. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. When the Constitution of the United States authorizes this House to make its own rules, and there is a rule which provides that when a member's name is called he shall vote, and when the gentleman from Maine and his friends abstain from voting, are they not guilty of disregarding the Constitution?

Mr. REED. But the Constitution of the United States does not authorize this House to override its provisions. The Constitution is superior to the House, and it is the business of the House to follow the Constitution—

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman allow me? Is it not true that a rule of this House, made in pursuance of the Constitution, is as binding as the Constitution itself?

Mr. REED (continuing). This House has caused the Constitution of the United States to be violated by demanding of its members a voting quorum where the Constitution requires only a present quorum, and it is that violation of the Constitution that places us in this position, a laughingstock for gods and men. [Laughter; applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan desires to submit some additional authority.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I have made this point in the utmost good faith; I think it is well taken. I think that members under arrest can not participate in proceedings looking to excusing themselves or others who are in the same category. Let me illustrate: Under our rules fifteen members may require the attendance of absentees; now, suppose that all the other members, three hundred and more, are away; the fifteen members secure their attendance; and the question comes up of excusing them; can they all come in and vote to excuse themselves? Or, suppose the body is composed of one hundred members, forty of whom are present; and they secure the attendance of the other sixty. It can not be possible that those sixty members can vote on the question whether they shall be excused.

I find an additional authority. In the Eighteenth Congress it was decided—

A MEMBER. Can the gentleman give us the page and volume?

Mr. BURROWS. I can not. I have not the volume before me, but I find it was then decided as follows:

Members under arrest can not participate in the proceedings of the House.

The point seems to me too plain for argument. I submit the matter to the Chair with a view of obtaining a ruling.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Will the gentleman allow me to submit to him a question before he takes his seat? In the case supposed by him fifteen members bring in three hundred. Now, would the gentleman say that those fifteen alone have the right to vote on the question whether the absentees shall be excused; that every one of the three hundred is disqualified from voting?

Mr. BURROWS. The point I make is that members who are under arrest as absentees can not participate in determining the question whether they shall be excused—

Mr. STOCKDALE. It seems to me that less than a quorum can not do anything but bring in the absentees.

Mr. BURROWS. My point is that members under arrest can not participate in the determination of the question whether they shall be excused, or fined, or subjected to other penalty.

Mr. SNODGRASS. In a House composed of one hundred and fifteen members, suppose one hundred, having absented themselves, should be arrested and brought before the bar of the House, would the fifteen members have the right to excuse or exonerate them, or to inflict any punishment by fine or otherwise, the Constitution requiring a majority of the body to do business?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Certainly, under proper rules.

The Chair will allow me to say that upon recurring to the authority I find that the action of Speaker Colfax, to which I before alluded, resolves itself into this, that a member who has been brought to the bar of the House and fined could not participate in the proceedings.

Mr. CATCHINGS. After he had been fined?

Mr. REED. After he had been fined. The authority is not what I thought it was; but I am still inclined to think (I have not consulted the original authority) that it will be found the present point is covered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I presume the gentleman refers to the first authority cited by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. In that case a resolution was offered fining in a body members who had been absent; and of course no one of those members had the right to vote upon it, because he was directly interested.

The SPEAKER. The case referred to by the gentleman from Michigan was a case in which fifty members, perhaps, were under arrest, and a motion was made to discharge them all. The question was raised whether the members under arrest were competent to vote on that question, and, as the Chair understands, the then Speaker held that they were not. What reason may have been given the present occupant of the chair does not know; perhaps it may have been because they were under arrest. But the present question is as to excusing the gentleman from California, and the question of the right to vote is raised not against that gentleman, but against other gentlemen who are under arrest or on parole by order of the House. The point is made that those gentlemen can not vote. The Chair does not understand how their right to vote can be taken away, and certainly under the present circumstances, the roll having been called and the gentlemen having answered, the Chair would not assume authority to direct their names to be stricken from the roll. If the House should desire to do so it is another matter. The Chair could not assume any such authority under the circumstances.

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If these gentlemen under arrest are not deprived of any privilege in the House, what is the utility of excusing them from arrest by motion?

The SPEAKER. The Constitution confers upon the House the right to impose penalties upon members for dereliction of duty. That penalty might extend as far as expulsion.

Mr. CURTIS. But if they are under no embarrassment by reason of the arrest, and are permitted to vote on every question that comes up—

The SPEAKER. They are under no embarrassment until the House puts it upon them.

Mr. CURTIS. But the House has put them under arrest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that the "embarrassment" resulting from arrest does not extend to depriving a member of the right to vote on a question like this.

Mr. CURTIS. Of what privilege, then, is he deprived?

The SPEAKER. The member is subject to such penalty as the House may impose; the House may fine a member or may expel him. The question pending is whether the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] shall be excused. If that proposition is voted down, he may be punished in such manner as the House may order; he may be fined, he may be expelled.

The gentleman seeks to argue that the arrest itself deprives the member of rights which he has under the rule. The Chair does not so understand it. It requires the action of the House to punish a member, and therefore the Chair thinks the point of order not well taken.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, under that ruling I desire to vote. I was present when my name was called, but supposing I had no right to do so, I did not respond.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request, unless the gentleman states he was present in the Hall and failed to hear his name called.

Mr. PICKLER. I heard my name called, but did not suppose I had a right to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request under the rule.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution in this connection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is engaged in discharging the order of the House.

Mr. BOATNER. This bears directly upon that order. I send to the desk a resolution and ask its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all further proceedings against members for nonattendance on the sessions of the House on yesterday are hereby dispensed with.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does that require unanimous consent?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that each member who is included in the warrant of the Sergeant-at-Arms and is under arrest has a right to give his excuse for his absence, and to make such explanation as he thinks proper.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Chair has ruled, as I understand it, that it is not in order to move to dispense with further proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled that a motion could not be made to discharge these members; because the rule provides that they shall be subject to such action as the House may take. The House may discharge them, or fine them, or take any other steps that it thinks proper.

Mr. BLAND. I did not understand the purport of the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana, and withdraw the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is clearly in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the resolution to the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let it be again read.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House has a right, if it sees proper, to adopt such a resolution.

The question was submitted.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard a moment?

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing.

Mr. BOWERS. I ask a question simply for information. If this resolution is adopted am I to carry the sins of all these others? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on agreeing to the resolution just read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 106.

Mr. BOWERS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOWERS. I withdraw the demand.

So, no further count being demanded, the resolution was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next name.

The name of Mr. DUNPHY was called.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DUNPHY has been called away by notice of a death in his family, and I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, under the circumstances stated, the name of Mr. DUNPHY will be passed over on this call.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The House can not excuse him in this manner, and the Clerk will call the next name.

The name of Mr. ELLIS was called.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ELLIS, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I was absent from the House on yesterday; and while I regard my excuse as perhaps insufficient, I will state it briefly and frankly. I was paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], and thought I had a right to leave. Some friends of mine from Kentucky were visiting my family, and I felt that it was my duty to pay them some attention. I was at home during the day, endeavoring to dispense Kentucky hospitality to the best of my ability.

I knew that the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was before the House. I had been present and listening to the prolonged discussion of that bill, and was satisfied that if there was any measure pending before the House which I could trust to my colleague from Kentucky, Governor McCREARY, it was that bill, which he was so largely instrumental in framing. Therefore I did not feel that my presence here was imperatively necessary, especially in view of the fact that I was paired, as I have stated.

These are the facts in my case, and the House may deal with them as it deems proper.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that my colleague be excused.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LIVINGSTON) there were—ayes 105, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next name.

The name of Mr. HARTER was called.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HARTER, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Speaker, I was in the House until about 3 o'clock on yesterday afternoon. I had some important business with the Assistant Postmaster General for the town in which I live; and as the General Post-Office building closes at 4 o'clock, I went there to transact that business. Hence I was absent when the call of the House took place.

Mr. CARUTH. I move that he be fined a silver dollar. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEARD. I move that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first submit the question on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 122, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the House has proceeded far enough in this matter to show that we are not going to do anything in this direction, and I hope we can go on with some business. Therefore I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. SNODGRASS. And I would like to suggest that it is a farce to expend $150 in anything of this sort again.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of dispensing with all further proceedings under the call and dismissing the warrant will say "aye."

The question being taken, the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLOUNT) there were—ayes 65, noes 97.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next name.

The name of Mr. HEMPHILL was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] has been absent without leave of the House. What has he to say?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CARUTH. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. CARUTH. It is that the gentleman must present his excuse at the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that the gentleman come to the bar of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMPHILL (coming to the bar of the House). I wish to say that I had to surrender my seat to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and his clerk and assistants, in connection with this bill. I went to my room in the hope that I would be able to devise some means by which I could secure more money for the people of this country; and while I was at that, I found that it was necessary to go to a dentist. I went there in the afternoon—

Mr. ALLEN. Did you expect to get money for the people from a dentist? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, but I wanted to get in good trim in order to think about it. In the afternoon I went to the dentist's. I want to state further that when I heard that the House was without a quorum I started to come here, but learned that the House had adjourned. Later, Mr. Hill, the assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, sent me his card and notified me that they wanted me here this morning.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman if he went to the races?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; I have not been to the races.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman to state that he was on his way here when he was taken in custody, and I therefore move that he be excused.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I was on my way here when I learned that the House had adjourned. Then, after 8 o'clock in the evening, Mr. Hill, the deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, sent me his card and notified me that the House had adjourned and that they wanted every one here to-day. I was really not arrested, except that I was notified.

The motion of Mr. McMILLIN, that Mr. HEMPHILL be excused, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next name.

The name of Mr. McDONALD was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McDONALD] has been absent from the sitting of the House without leave. What has he to say?

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated that I was absent yesterday, but I wish to say to the House that I was here until 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon or thereabouts, and when I left here it was simply to walk around the grounds with a portion of my constituents that I am somewhat interested in—my wife and two children. [Laughter and applause.]

After walking around the grounds and through the Botanical Garden I returned to my hotel a little tired. When I heard that my presence was needed I immediately repaired to the House and was informed that the House had adjourned. I was not at any time arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I had the pleasure of meeting his representative last night at half past 11 o'clock, in my hotel. He then told me to report here this morning. It was not necessary for him to admonish me as to my duty. I have been here always promptly at every roll call. That is my excuse, and I have no other to offer.

Mr. PAGE of Rhode Island. I move that the gentleman from New Jersey be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next name.

The name of Mr. MEREDITH was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] was absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What has he to say?

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD, I think, will show that I was here until late yesterday evening. There was a recorded vote which will show that, and I really thought that our friends had got through their foolishness when I left. I was called on by a Senator to go with him a little way.

Mr. CARUTH. How far out?

Mr. MEREDITH. I got there, but did not get there yesterday. [Laughter.] I asked my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] to have me excused if there was another roll call.

And in the discharge of the highest duty of a Representative I went with a member of the District Committee from the Senate just across the river, because I had heard that there were some races going on there.

Mr. CARUTH. Were there any Kentucky horses there?

Mr. MEREDITH. Yes, sir; there were Kentucky horses, and I expected to see the gentleman there. It has been mooted here for sometime as to whether or not the race course should be removed outside of the District of Columbia, and in the interest of my friend, Mr. EDMUNDS of Virginia, and my friend from Mississippi, Mr. ALLEN, and my friend from Kentucky, Mr. CARUTH, I thought I would go and make an inspection and find out whether there was any proper place for a race course, in order that I might be sufficiently informed to prepare a bill, if necessary, and present it to this House, either to have it removed or let it alone. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I went there I did not suppose there was to be another roll call. When I left it was late in the evening. I want to tell the exact truth, and that is my excuse. If my friends excuse me it is all right; if they do not, it is their own privilege.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the gentleman; what is its desire?

Mr. CARUTH. I desire to know whether the gentleman does not come within the exception of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Georgia. Is not that a "providential cause?"

Mr. MEREDITH. I think so.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the gentleman from Virginia be excused.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he did not go on two previous occasions to make the same investigation?

Mr. MEREDITH. I will say in reply to my friend that if I did I paid my own expenses. The Government did not pay them.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division being called for, the House divided, and there were—ayes 103, noes 46.

So Mr. MEREDITH was excused.

The next name called was that of Mr. PICKLER.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to reintroduce his resolution. If this is not a sufficient case in this House, why should we use any more time in requiring these excuses?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota has been absent from the House without its leave; what excuse has he to offer?

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, the Sergeant-at-Arms, about 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, called on me, and found me in bed sick, and requested me to be here to-day. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in explanation, that I was here yesterday, and I think I have been as constant in my attendance through this session of Congress as any other member. I was here until after 3 o'clock, and until the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MILLER] had made a motion to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. Then I went homeward, and went to the Agricultural Department, having a little business there, and around the city home, and then went to bed sick. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARUTH. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. PICKLER. I supposed that when the leader of this House, the gentleman having this bill in charge [Mr. BLOUNT], had made a motion to adjourn, and I voted on that, that he meant to follow that up, as things were going, until there was an adjournment.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Was the sickness of the gentleman from South Dakota the result of not getting the place he was after at the Agricultural Department? [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I refuse to answer such a question.

The question was taken, and Mr. PICKLER was excused.

The next name called was that of Mr. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has been absent without leave of the House, and he will be heard to make his excuse.

Mr. ALLEN. Is there any extra punishment for a second offense? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is for the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I was here yesterday up to 20 minutes to 4 o'clock, and the RECORD shows that I had answered to my name up to that time. At 15 minutes to 4 I had an important engagement at the War Department, relating to a bill I introduced here on Wednesday, and I left the House to keep that engagement. When I left the War Department I met Mr. Robinson, the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, who informed me that there was a call of the House. I told him that I would go up immediately and stay all night if necessary; but, before I reached here, the flag was down, and I was told by a member of this House that the House had adjourned. I have no further apology to offer in this matter. I was attending faithfully to important business of my constituents, and I mean to be found doing that duty so long as I represent them on this floor.

The SPEAKER. What is the will of the House?

Mr. WISE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The next name called was that of Mr. STACKHOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina has been absent from the House during its session without its leave. He will be heard to give his own excuse.

Mr. STACKHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I was not absent yesterday at all. I was in my seat all day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not absent; then the gentleman will be discharged.

The name of Mr. TRACEY was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York having been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave will now be heard in his own defense.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House yesterday until after 2 o'clock, when I went away from the House for a time. I do not know that I ought to consider myself under arrest, because last evening, after 8 o'clock I think, Mr. Hill, the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, came into the room where I was dining and told me that I was required to be present to-day. This morning on my arrival at the House, before the hour of meeting, I went to the desk and reported myself as present. So I think I did all that was necessary to do under the rule.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The name of Mr. WARWICK was called.

Mr. HAYNES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. WARWICK] is sick and unable to be present in the House to-day. I wish to state, however, in his behalf that he was present during the session of yesterday and voted on every roll call, as the RECORD shows, until the vote on adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that under the rule an excuse for a member's absence can not be submitted by anyone but the member himself; so that perhaps this case had better be passed over for the present.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARWICK] is ill; and I move that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would require unanimous consent to consider that motion in the absence of the gentleman [Mr. WARWICK].

Mr. CURTIS. Then I ask unanimous consent that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. DUNPHY] be excused on account of a death in his family.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. This completes the list.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILSON of Kentucky, on account of sickness.

To Mr. DUNPHY, until Thursday, on account of a death in his family.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Amend Rule IV by adding at the end of clause 1 the following:

"And the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to withhold and retain the pay of a member at the end of each month until there is filed with him a statement in writing by such member, and over the member's signature, that he has not been absent from the House during the month next preceding; and if he has been absent during the next preceding month, and such absence was not necessary on account of the sickness of himself or of some member of his family, the statement shall set forth the exact number of days' absence of the member occasioned by other than the above causes, and the Sergeant-at-Arms shall deduct the salary for such absence, as provided in section 40 of the Revised Statutes.

"Any violation of this rule by the Sergeant-at-Arms shall make him liable on his bond for all payments made contrary to the provisions of section 40 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, must not that be referred to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule one day's notice is required of a proposition to amend the rules.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this proposes to do more than amend the rules. It enacts a law by which the Sergeant-at-Arms is made liable in a certain contingency.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will lie over for the present.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rose to ask that the resolution be sent to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think it is hardly proper to refer it to the Committee on Rules, because in order to be effectual it would have to take the form of a bill or resolution requiring the signature of the President. It proposes to change the existing law regarding the duties and liabilities of the Sergeant-at-Arms. It proposes to enact a law by which he shall be charged upon his bond with a certain liability for any payment he may make in violation of the law.

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentleman from Missouri that the resolution simply seeks to enforce the law as it now stands upon the statute book, and I submit to him whether, without the resolution, the Sergeant-at-Arms would not be responsible upon his bond if he were to pay out money contrary to the law?

The SPEAKER. The resolution, being a proposition to amend the rules, will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that all members having reports to present have leave to file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make may be permitted to file them with the Clerk.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I ask leave of absence for the remainder of the day, as I am quite unwell.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. I understand that the regular order is the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the report from the Committee on Printing in relation to a speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. Does the gentleman from Louisiana demand the regular order?

Mr. BOATNER. No, sir. I understood that it was the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing, upon which the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. BUNN. I do not like to object to the proposition of my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], but I think he ought to withdraw it so as to give us an opportunity to consider business on the Private Calendar. If he will withdraw his request, I wish to ask unanimous consent that we proceed with business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am willing to withdraw the request temporarily so that the gentleman may test the wish of the House in regard to the business it will take up. If the House desires to go on with private business I certainly will not object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia withdraw his request?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do, temporarily. Unless the House decides to go on with private business, I am anxious to proceed with the diplomatic and consular bill.

Mr. BUNN. I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLAND. I object. I think we ought to go on with the diplomatic bill. If we are to get away from here before next fall we must attend to the public business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, as the Chair understands, renews his request that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and also that members may have leave to file reports with the Clerk.

Mr. BOATNER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the resolution which was pending some days ago—the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing with reference to remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. If the regular order is demanded, that business must be resumed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any mode by which we can enter a nolle prosequi in the case against Mr. WALKER? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I think the resolution with regard to Mr. WALKER might be dropped by general consent of the House. If the gentleman from Kentucky would ask unanimous consent that the proceedings against Mr. WALKER be dropped—

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would not like to do that.

Mr. REED. Everybody would agree to it, and we might "live happy ever afterward."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes, sir, I object, and demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the resolution of the Committee on Printing, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that this matter go over until to-morrow morning. I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] that if this be agreed to, it will then be competent for the House to-day to go on with either private or public business, as it may prefer. With the view of proceeding with the business of the House, I ask unanimous consent that this matter go over till to-morrow morning. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he were in his seat, would object to this. I certainly should not make the motion if I thought it not agreeable to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] asks unanimous consent that the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing be passed over until to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The regular order having been demanded, the business first in order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BUNN. I ask that that be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote or unanimous consent.

Mr. BUNN. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUNN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CASTLE. If this motion be agreed to, will members be permitted to file reports with the Clerk in accordance with the consent which was asked awhile ago?

Mr. BUNN. I ask that such consent be given.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request. Unanimous consent is asked that gentlemen having reports be permitted to file them with the Clerk. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The question is now upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BUNN], that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUNN) there were—ayes 76, noes 53.

Mr. BROWN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. BUNN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 56.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The motion is agreed to, and the gentleman from Missouri will please take the chair.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. BUNN. Too late.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman rise to make the point of no quorum?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will accept the gentleman's statement, and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point. So (no further count being demanded) the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

HENRY H. AND CHARLOTTE K. SIBLEY.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1466) for the relief of the personal representatives and heirs of Henry H. and Charlotte K. Sibley.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] was pending when the House was last in Committee of the Whole considering this bill. The Clerk will report that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That in no event shall the finding of the Court of Claims exceed $37,700.11.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"The Court of Claims is authorized to adjudicate the claim of the legal personal representatives of Henry H. Sibley, deceased, growing out of a contract made by Henry H. Sibley in his lifetime with the Government of the United States for the use of a patented invention in the manufacture of a tent known as the Sibley tent; and that for this purpose the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction, notwithstanding any bar of the statute of limitations."

SEC. 2. That either party to any suit that may be brought under the provisions of this act shall have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from any final judgment the Court of Claims may render."

Mr. GROUT. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUNN. The substitute that has just been read was adopted by the committee some time ago, and then an amendment was offered to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment, the Chair understands, was the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and has just been voted upon.

Mr. GROUT. Now I offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "authorize," in the first line, and insert instead:

"To inquire into and report to Congress the facts in the claim of the legal and personal representatives of Henry H. Sibley, deceased, growing out of a contract made by said Sibley, in his lifetime, with the Government of the United States for the use of an alleged patented invention in the manufacture of a tent known as the 'Sibley tent,' and especially all facts relating to the invention and procurement of said alleged patent bearing upon its validity."

The CHAIRMAN. If the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina is correct as to the present status, if the substitute of Mr. BYNUM has been already adopted by the committee, the Chair thinks the amendment would not now be in order.

Mr. BUNN. I was going to make that point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GROUT. The amendment is proposed to the substitute, and is in lieu of a portion of it only. It is an amendment to one that has been already agreed to. It leaves a portion of that substitute as it was before and does not change it entirely. I think if the Chair will reflect for a moment he will see that it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the record to be examined, with a view to ascertaining the exact status of the bill.

Mr. GROUT. I think it is correct that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana was agreed to. I so understood it.

Mr. BUNN. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some trouble about it, and I have asked the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the amendment now, with the understanding that he may offer it in the House and have a vote upon it there.

Mr. GROUT. If that be the understanding of the committee I will agree to the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill, as amended, be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. BUTLER. Pending that I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know the status of this case. It has been stated that the substitute just read was adopted some time ago. My recollection is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] moved to amend the substitute by inserting words to the effect "that in no event shall the court find in excess of $37,000." That amendment we have voted down, but the substitute I think has not yet been voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair accepted the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Vermont on that point; but will cause the record to be examined.

Mr. BUTLER. Upon what basis could the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be in order after the substitute had been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. Simply because no point of order was made against it.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the record upon that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will examine the RECORD.

Mr. GROUT. I think upon an examination of the RECORD you will find that there was another amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] on which the question really recurred this morning.

Mr. BUNN. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be considered as adopted.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not object. My only purpose is to have the proceedings conform to the record. I wish to keep the record straight.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, after an examination of the RECORD, that when the committee were last in session, having this bill under consideration, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] was pending to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] at the time the committee rose and reported to the House. Now the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] has been voted down by the committee, but the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] has not been acted upon.

Mr. BUNN. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] may be adopted.

Mr. GROUT. I think you will find, Mr. Chairman, that the week previous the substitute was agreed to. I have it firmly fixed in my mind.

Mr. BUNN (after consulting the RECORD). Here it is—agreed to. The fact was announced. The tellers reported ayes 103, noes 2, on Mr. BYNUM's proposition; so the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROUT. I was very confident that had been done.

Mr. BUNN. The record is on page 3340 of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BUNN] is correct, and that that is the status of the bill. The question now is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside and reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being taken; the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BERGEN. Division.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Is this Mr. BYNUM's proposition?

Mr. BUNN. Yes.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 37.

Mr. BERGEN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey makes the point of no quorum; and the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BERGEN] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BUNN].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 126, noes 41.

So the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HIRAM JOHNSON AND OTHERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1219) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the respective sums of money as hereinafter provided, to the respective persons named herein, or to their heirs or legal representatives, to wit:

To Ketton M. Jones, $361.15. In all, $22,271.26.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. ENLOE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1219) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others, submit the following report:

The facts of this claim are fully set forth in a report made by this committee to the House in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, hereto annexed and made a part of this report.

Your committee therefore adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 14, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises and the reasons of the committee for recommending the passage of the bill will be found stated in the report of the Committee on War Claims, submitted to the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, by Gen. Bragg, of Wisconsin, who was then chairman of said committee, which report is as follows:

[House Report, No. 1345, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hiram Johnson and others for relief, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on Military Affairs, No. 184, second session, Forty-fourth Congress, and in reports from the Secretary of War, with correspondence attached, on file with the papers in the case, and are in substance as follows:

On the 25th day of November, 1892, a party of rebels made a raid upon a small force of Union troops stationed at Henderson, in the State of Tennessee, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. The raiding party captured the Union troops, with their arms and camp equipage; burned a quantity of cotton belonging to the United States and to private individuals, and also destroyed the depot buildings and water tank belonging to the railway corporation.

Thereupon, on the 23 day of December following, the commandant of the Union forces at the post of Bethel, Tenn. (Col. J. N. Haynie, Fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers), appointed a board of officers to investigate the losses sustained and appraise the damages suffered from the raid, with a view to an assessment by way of reprisal upon rebel sympathizers in and about Henderson.

The board so appointed assessed the value of the property captured and destroyed as follows:

Cotton burned belonging to the United States	$1,900.00
Arms and camp equipage belonging to the United States	3,180.00
Total belonging to the United States	5,080.00
Cotton belonging to private persons	18,171.36
Railway property	3,500.00
Grand total	26,751.36

Upon this report being made, Col. Haynie ordered an assessment of this amount to be levied upon the rebel sympathizers in and about Henderson, which action was approved at the headquarters of the district of Jackson, in the Department of Tennessee, Brig. Gen. Sullivan commanding, on the 12th day of December, 1862; and an order bearing date on that day was issued from said last-named headquarters directing the collection of the tax.

Col. Haynie proceeded in the execution of the order, and collected of the said assessment the sum of $23,325.16, leaving a deficit of $3,426.20 not collected, by reason of the absence of the persons against whom the same was assessed. And thereafter, but at what precise date does not appear, Col. W. W. Sanford, Forty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, commanding post at Bethel, made an additional and supplemental assessment for $4,326.20, to make up such deficit; and of this amount there was collected $4,026.20, making the total amount collected to repair losses and damages sustained by said raid $27,351.36; all of which sum was paid by the persons now asking relief by this petition.

The right of the military commandant, in time of war, to order and enforce assessments upon hostile communities by way of reprisal, and to prevent the giving information and encouragement to enemies outside of his lines by enemy sympathizers within his lines, is well settled and affirmed by all writers upon the laws of war, and is a most salutary check upon predatory incursions, by making the friends of those who commit the damage bear the brunt of the injury suffered.

At the time of the appraisal of the damages and of the levying and collecting these assessments it was supposed to be under and in execution of an order of Gen. Grant, then commanding the troops in that department. But it appears from the papers filed that Gen. Grant disavowed the construction put upon his general orders by the local officers, and declared the purpose and intent of his general order to be that reprisal should be made by way of levy and assessment in case of raids within our lines, like the one at Henderson, only to repay such losses as the Government might sustain in its property thereby, and he refused to recognize the right of private claimants to reimbursement by such levy and assessment; and on the 23d day of January, 1863, ordered the proceeds of such assessment and collection to be turned over to the provost-marshal-general; and it appears by the papers filed that his action in denying the right of private claimants to reimbursement for losses sustained by the raid out of this fund was approved by the Secretary of War, on the report made thereon by Gen. M. C. Meigs, which report maintains the law to be that the power existed to levy and collect an assessment to pay private losses in the discretion of the general commanding; but as against such general's construction of his own order and purpose no right whatever could accrue to a private claimant for reimbursement.

The logical sequence from these facts, and this declaration and construction by Gen. Grant of his orders, seems to be that the subordinates, in the execution of the orders of the commanding general, should have made an assessment only for the losses sustained by the Government, viz:

For cotton burned belonging to the United States	$1,900
Arms and camp equipage belonging to the United States	3,180
	5,080

Had the Government rebuilt or repaired the injury to the railway property, as an essential for their use of it, that also should be included as a proper item for assessment; but the evidence shows that the railway company repaired their injuries at their own expense.

Deducting this amount, for which the assessment was authorized, from the total amount collected, there remains a balance $22,271.36 taken from the petitioners under a misconstruction of the order of the commanding general, as certified to by his own action and the evidence of an officer of his staff.

This committee have maintained, and still adhere to the doctrine, that no nation is liable for the wilful torts of its soldiery.

But was this assessment a tort, within the meaning of such well-established doctrine? It is submitted that this wrong is clearly without the rule, because this assessment was collected by an officer of high rank, commanding a military district, in the execution of an office giving him colorable authority, to say the least, to do the act he did; and that act was ratified by the general commanding, impliedly at least, by not ordering restitution when the excessive assessment came to his knowledge.

But if the reasoning on this point may be deemed questionable, there is upon the facts another and complete answer to the application of this principle. The proof shows to an absolute certainty that of the money so collected $23,325.16 was applied by the United States to its use, knowing the source from whence it was derived, and the remainder of the sum, $4,026.20, by all reasonable presumption, was likewise applied to the use of the Government. And the committee is so constrained to hold, as a contrary conclusion would compel us to impeach the integrity of a gallant officer who fell before Vicksburg without a stain upon his citizen or soldier life.

The law of the case, then, may be stated to be, that if the officers, agents of the Government, committed a tort originally, it was approved by the principal, the Government, when it knowingly accepted the benefits of the tortious acts. And no proceedings by way of confiscation or condemnation have ever been had to divest the persons so assessed of their right in the surplus fund.

Hence your committee are constrained to hold that the claims of the petitioners to the amount collected of them ($22,271.36) in excess of the requirements of Gen. Grant are valid, and that the Government ought in right to refund the same; and report herewith a bill redistributing the same to the persons who paid the same ratably, in proportion to the sums originally paid by each of them, respectively, and recommend its passage.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report herewith a substitute for the bill and recommend its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] moves that this bill be laid aside and reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, it is not pleasant at any time to oppose—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] will suspend for one moment. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire recognition?

Mr. McMILLIN. Not at present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, it is not pleasant at any time to oppose bills offered here by members of Congress, because they feel a deep personal interest in them evidently, and are asked to introduce them; but we have here now a bill that, if fully understood by this House, would not be recommended at any time. The report just read is the report of the present committee. This bill has been before the American Congress for a great many years. I have sent to get the report of former committees, but found myself unable to do so through pages and employees; but finally I, by my own personal efforts, secured a former report on this same bill. It is report No. 75, first session Forty-eighth Congress. It was made by Judge Geddes of Ohio, a Democratic member of the Forty-eighth Congress, upon this claim, and I now desire that the Clerk read that report for the information of the House. I hope the House will give it attention in order that they may understand the real merits of this claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paper sent up by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OWENS].

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1477) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and other persons, have given careful consideration of the same, and ask to report:

That the claim was presented to the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-seventh Congress, and a report was made in regard to it by said committee on the 28th of February, 1882. As the examination by your committee has led them substantially to the same results with those arrived at by the committee of the Forty-seventh Congress, they do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but refer to that report, and herewith annex a copy for information.

Your committee, therefore, report adversely to the bill.

[House Report No. 564, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

FEBRUARY 28, 1882.—Reported adversely, committed to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUK, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1587:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the accompanying bill (H. R. 1587) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others, have had the same under consideration, and, after a most careful examination of the law and facts involved, report it back adversely. This claim has been before both branches of Congress, and has been reported favorably several times. It has an interesting history, both departmental and legislative. Its origin was as peculiar as its varying fortunes have proved changeable. It grew out of the incidents of the late war, and is based upon a supposed state of facts, which, if true, would ground it upon the clearest principles of law applicable to the case assumed to exist. But if it was established as contended by the claimants it would rest upon legal grounds alone without any peculiar equity to quicken the remedy of the supposed wrong.

The United States forces occupied the town of Henderson, Tenn., in the fall of 1862, and that particular locality was at the time destitute of any lawful government except such as pertained to military authority. War was rampant at that time, and the commanding officers of the United States army exercised control over that neighborhood except in so far as the rebel forces were able to dispute their right to rule.

In the month of November of that year a rebel military force made a somewhat successful raid on the Union troops stationed at Henderson, and captured and destroyed a quantity of property belonging to the United States Government, and also a greater amount which belonged to certain private citizens of undoubted loyalty. Col. J. N. Haynie, of the Forty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, was in command of the post at that place, and immediately took cognizance of the rebel raid, as appears from the following military order and proceedings thereunder, as reported to his superior officer:

HEADQUARTERS POST OF BETHEL,
Bethel, Tenn., December 9, 1862.

T. H. HARRIS,
Assistant Adjutant-General, Headquarters District of Jackson:

"By order of Col. J. N. Haynie, colonel Fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, commanding the post.

"W. BEDFORD, Post Adjutant."

That afterwards said commission met, and after investigating the matter referred to them, submitted a report, of which the following is a copy:

The parties whom this amount not collected is assessed against are in the rebel army, and have no property at home that can be made pay the amounts they are assessed. To make this amount good on the original assessment I ordered the deficiency to be assessed on those persons who had not been assessed, but who were equally liable as rebel co-operators and sympathizers, which was done, and some $1,500 of it has been collected. Shall I return this amount to the persons from whom it was collected and take up the receipts given, or shall I pay it over to Lieut. Col. M. Smith? The balance not yet collected can be got in a short time, as the persons who were assessed have all made their arrangements to get the money.

Respectfully submitted.

WM. W. SANFORD,

Colonel Forty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, Commanding Post.

Capt. F. H. HARRIS, A. A. G.,
Headquarters District of Jackson.

We find this matter further explained in the Glover report, of March 2, 1867, as follows:

The intention in ordering that money to be paid to Col. Webster was to make him custodian of the fund for the indemnification of the United States, John Aldridge, and other loyal citizens who had suffered by the raid on Henderson Station. When Col. Sanford brought the first installment of the collection up to Jackson, Col. Webster was not in the city, and Col. Sanford paid over the amount to Gen. Sullivan, and received his receipt for the same. Gen. Sullivan, after keeping the money for a short time, became nervous on account of having no safe place of deposit for it, and telegraphed to Maj. Gen. Grant for orders as to what disposition he should make of it. Gen. Grant replied to Gen. Sullivan, ordering him to turn the money over to the provost-marshal at Jackson, Tenn., Maj. Smith.

This was that first sum of $8,388.20. The next payments were made to Maj. Smith by Col. Sanford under Gen. Sullivan's orders and orders from Maj. Gen. Grant. One payment was made to Col. Webster, for the reason that the United States had a claim for arms, camp, and garrison equipage, and it was supposed that Col. Webster was the proper custodian of that property. Maj. Smith turned over his receipts to the provost-marshal-general of the Department of Tennessee, in regular routine of business, in accordance with a telegram which reads as follows:

"UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
"Jackson, January 23, 1863.

"By telegraph from Memphis, January 23, 1863.

"To Major SMITH, Provost-Marshal:

"Funds turned over to you will be accounted for to the provost-marshal-general.

"U. S. GRANT,
"Major-General."

This has reference to the money which had been assessed and collected as already shown, for the purpose of reimbursing the Government and the loyal citizens mentioned for their losses sustained by the rebel raid on the 25th of November, 1862.

To complete the military history of this matter it is necessary to add a few other orders.

[Special Order No. 64.]

HEADQUARTERS POST, BETHEL, TENN.

It having come to the knowledge of these headquarters that some of the persons assessed under Special Order No. 15, district of Jackson, are not at home, but are said to be in the rebel army, and as their property is in such a condition that the amounts assessed can not be collected from them, and as the brigadier-general commanding has ordered a reduction of assessment in form of some of the other assessed parties, it is therefore ordered that Maj. W. J. Stephenson, commanding at Henderson, proceed to assess the amount caused by the above failure to pay amount reduction of assessment upon such other disloyal and rebel sympathizers as may be hereafter named, to wit:

Sol. G. Thomasson.....	$300.00
Tison Maness (paid $515 March 4).....	700.00
Keton M. Jones, paid March 2.....	450.00
John Robinson, paid February 16, 1863.....	300.00
Stephen Massengill, paid February 14, 1863.....	150.00
William Walker, sr., paid February 14, 1863.....	150.00
William H. Bond, paid February 18, 1863.....	150.00
A. S. Rodgers, paid February 20, 1863.....	426.20
Frank Ballard, paid February 28, 1863.....	300.00
Cal. McNight, paid February 28, 1863.....	250.00
Hugh McNight, paid February 10, 1863.....	250.00
William Shrink, paid February 27, 1863.....	250.00
James Thomas, paid March 3, 1863.....	250.00
John G. Smith, paid February 20, 1863.....	100.00

Total..... 4,326.20

The amount he will assess will be $4,326.20, which he will so distribute as to make as many disloyal citizens bear the assessment as possible, taking the same percentage as on previous assessments, sending to these headquarters the names of the persons he selects, and the amount assessed on each one. He will use the utmost dispatch in the matter, as it must be closed up at once.

By order

WM. W. SANFORD,

Colonel Forty-eighth Illinois, Commanding Post.

"WILLIAM J. STEPHENSON,

"Captain, Commanding Post, Henderson Station.

"Assistant Adjutant."

Capt. Stephenson will make report and pay over from time to time all moneys so collected to these headquarters.

By order

J. N. HAYNE,

Colonel Forty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, Commanding Post.

W. BEDFORD,

Post Adjutant.

This concludes the historical facts, which are undisputed; and in order to properly understand what is to follow, it is deemed best to make a more summary statement of the points established.

First, it is clearly shown that there was a rebel raid on the United States military post at Henderson, Tenn., on the 25th of November, 1862, and that the raiding party captured and destroyed property as follows:

Cotton belonging to the United States.....	$1,900.00
Arms and camp equipage belonging to the United States.....	3,180.00
Total belonging to the United States.....	5,080.00
Cotton belonging to John Aldridge and Smith J. Patterson.....	2,605.36
Cotton belonging to W. De Silver.....	2,565.00
Cotton belonging to Willis N. Arnold.....	6,000.00
Total belonging to loyal citizens.....	18,171.36
Depot house, property of Mobile and Ohio Railroad.....	2,000.00
Water tank, Mobile and Ohio Railroad.....	1,500.00
Total belonging to railroad.....	3,500.00
Putting these sums together gives a grand total of.....	26,751.36

damages assessed by the military authorities for the purpose of reimbursing the Government and the citizens as already explained.

Secondly, it is equally clear that the sum of $27,351.36 was collected from disloyal citizens to pay the several items of damage mentioned. This was in excess of the amount required in the sum of $480. It was all collected, and the parties on whom assessments had been made as hereinbefore shown giving receipts for the several sums paid by them.

Thirdly, it appears that the principal part of this money was turned over to the provost-marshal-general of the United States, by direction of Gen. Grant, and that it is now in the Treasury, less the sum of $9,606.36 paid to Aldridge and Patterson by reason of a special act of Congress passed March 3, 1875, and approved by President Grant, of that date.

As already stated, the claim of Hiram Johnson and others, as provided for in this bill, has been reported favorably in both branches of Congress, and passed the House of Representatives on the 17th day of May, 1880. These favorable reports, and the action by the House of Representatives in passing the bill, seem to have been the result of a misapprehension of the facts of the case. For instance, the Committee on War Claims, in reporting the bill to the Forty-sixth Congress, makes the following statement:

"At the time of the appraisal of the damages and of the levying and collecting these assessments it was supposed to be under and in execution of an order of Gen. Grant, then commanding the troops in that department. But it appears from the papers filed that Gen. Grant disavowed the construction put upon his general orders by the local officers, and declared the purpose and intent of his general order to be that reprisal should be made by way of levy and assessment in case of raids within our lines like the one at Henderson, only to repay such losses as the Government might sustain in its property thereby, and he refused to recognize the right of private claimants to reimbursement by such levy and assessment; and on the 23d day of January, 1863, ordered the proceeds of such assessment and collection to be turned over to the provost-marshal-general. And it appears by the papers filed that his action in denying the right of private claimants to reimbursement for losses sustained by the raid out of this fund was approved by the Secretary of War, on the report made thereon by Gen. M. C. Meigs; which report maintains the law to be that the power existed to levy and collect an assessment to pay private losses in the discretion of the general commanding; but as against such general's construction of his own order and purpose no right whatever could accrue to a private claimant for reimbursement.

"The logical sequence from these facts, and this declaration and construction by Gen. Grant of his orders, seems to be, that the subordinates, in the execution of the orders of the commanding general, should have made an assessment only for the losses sustained by the Government, viz:

For cotton burned belonging to the United States.....	$1,900
Arms and camp equipage belonging to the United States.....	3,180
	5,080

If the facts stated were actually established by the papers on file, and the testimony before the present committee, it would most likely concur with the reasoning and conclusions of its predecessor.

But this committee do not find these facts established by the testimony presented for their consideration.

On the contrary, there is nothing in the present record to authorize the assumption that "the levying and collecting these assessments was supposed to be under, and in execution of, an order of Gen. Grant," except an unofficial letter from William S. Hillyer, written from memory only, some eighteen years after the transaction. Nor does it appear that Gen. Grant desires "the right of private claimants to reimbursement for losses sustained by the raid out of this fund," except from the same letter; and it is worthy of note that this letter was written, in part at least, to explain some imputation against the writer.

The papers on file do not show that Gen. Grant ever issued an order bearing special and direct reference to these several proceedings until after the assessments had been made and the money collected. The testimony shows that the proceeding originated with Col. Hayne, commanding the post at Henderson, and afterwards received the approval of Brig. Gen. Sullivan, commanding the district of Jackson, Sixteenth Army Corps, Department of the Tennessee. And the favorable report made to the Forty-sixth Congress in this case recognizes what it is conceived is the true rule of law applicable to the existing conditions at the time of the assessment and collection of the money in controversy. That report says:

"The right of the military commandant, in time of war, to order and enforce assessments upon hostile communities by way of reprisal, and to prevent the giving information and encouragement to enemies outside his lines by enemy sympathizers within his lines, is well settled and affirmed by all writers upon the laws of war, and is a most salutary check upon predatory incursions, by making the friends of those who commit the damage bear the brunt of the injury suffered."

This is conceded to be the law of the case, and it is unnecessary to elaborate the legal argument; yet it is proper to say that the several orders having been issued by Col. Hayne and Gen. Sullivan, "officers of high rank," and the several steps taken thereunder, as hereinbefore shown, it follows as a "logical sequence from these facts" and a legal deduction from the law that the assessment and collection of this money was not "a tort" in any sense whatever, but a legitimate military proceeding for a lawful purpose, and the fund should be applied to the uses for which it was intended.

It is true, the superior officers of Hayne and Sullivan could have revoked or countermanded their orders, but this was not done, as assumed in the reports heretofore made on this claim. In the absence of the disapproval of the action of these inferior officers by their superiors, every presumption arises in favor of their ratification of all that was done in the premises. And if this were not so, if these presumptions did not arise, the record furnishes ample testimony to satisfy this committee that the action of Col. Hayne and Gen. Sullivan received the affirmative approval of Gen. Grant. It will be remembered that on the 23d of January, 1863, he directed this money to be accounted to the provost-marshal-general, and we find a letter on file in the case of Willis N. Arnold, now before this committee, and whose bill is being considered in conjunction with the present bill for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others. This letter bears date, "Washington, D. C., June 26, 1866," and was written by Gen. Adam Badeau, then on Gen. Grant's staff. It was at a period much nearer the time these military proceedings were had, and must be taken as a correct interpretation of the whole proceeding on the part of Gen. Grant and his subordinates. It is in reply to Willis N. Arnold, who had called on him for aid in his case, which is now before Congress. The full text of that letter is as follows:

"In reply to your communication of June 11, addressed to Lieut. Gen. Grant, and requesting that you, as a loyal citizen, might be remunerated for losses sustained by you at the burning of Henderson, Tenn., Gen. Grant directs me to inform you that an assessment was made by Gen. Sullivan, by his orders, upon the property of disloyal citizens for the purpose of remunerating the sufferers at Henderson, and that since Gen. Sullivan has been mustered out of the service he has informed Gen. Grant that a certain amount of such assessment remains in his hands.

"Gen. Grant advised Gen. Sullivan to turn over the said sum to the authorities, so that it might be devoted to the uses for which it was collected."

On the 16th of February, 1882, Gen. Badeau examined this letter and indorsed it as follows:

"The above letter was written by me June 23, 1863, together with the im-impressions, while I was serving on the staff of Lieut. Gen. Grant."

This not only negates the assumption that the assessment and collection of money by Col. Hayne and Gen. Sullivan, for the purpose of reimbursing loyal citizens who suffered by the rebel raid on Henderson, was disapproved by Gen. Grant, but it clearly shows that Gen. Grant fully approved of the proceeding, if he did not, in fact, directly authorize it, and that he desired the money to "be devoted to the uses for which it was collected."

And this view of the matter is further emphasized by the fact that he approved the act of Congress, passed while he was President, to pay Aldridge, one of the loyal citizens for whose benefit this assessment and collection was made, out of the fund thus collected and turned into the Treasury. The committee have felt it their duty to detail the several matters of fact disclosed in the official and unofficial testimony before them, and to interpret the whole case in the light of a letter from Gen. Grant, on file with the papers, dated February 20, 1862.

Among other things, Gen. Grant says in this letter, bearing on the Henderson raid, "I have no recollection of loyal citizens having been molested at that time, or of having ordered collections in their behalf, but whatever the record may be, made at the time, it may be taken as the exact facts. What I here state is simply from recollection." He had previously stated in his letter that he had "no records or papers relating to the war" in his possession.

The committee, therefore, find that the record clearly establishes the fact that loyal citizens were molested; that their property was destroyed; that its value was adjudged by a proper military commission; that assessments were made on disloyal persons to reimburse this loss; that the money was collected; that it was turned into the Treasury to "be devoted to the uses for which it was collected;" that the said money is now in the Treasury, less the amount paid to Aldridge and Patterson; and that there is no legal or equitable right in any one of the claimants mentioned in this bill to any part of said fund; but that, having been properly assessed and collected for a specific purpose, it should be devoted to that use or held in the Treasury as an indemnity to the United States.

Although the national authority exercised the right of reprisal in but few instances during the late war, yet where, as in this case, the right was enforced, and the Government through its "officers of high rank" elected to ratify and carry out the proceeding, there is no reason why those for whose benefit it was intended should now be deprived of the indemnity due them under the action had in their behalf.

In consideration of the premises, the committee recommend that the bill (H. R. 1587) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others do not pass.

Mr. OWENS. Now, gentleman, I desire to call attention to this claim, for the reason that it has been before Congress so many years. It was reported on adversely in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses.

Mr. OATES. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if this matter has been passed upon by the Court of Claims? Has it ever been before that court?

Mr. OWENS. I think not. If it has, I would be glad to get the information. I think it has never been before the Court of Claims. In my opinion, if this claim is just, and these men ought to be paid back this money, collected, as it was, under the authority of the United States Army, then I think it simply commits this Congress to the payment for all devastations done down there.

I do not see any difference whatever between this claim and one for the payment for the slaves who were in their possession when the war came on. These things are not pleasant personally; but they are matters of history. If this Government wants to commit itself to the theory of paying for all the harm done and all the property taken, where will the end be? Now, I say this matter was carefully considered by Judge Geddes, chairman of the committee at that time, a learned lawyer and a Democrat; and he reported it adversely.

Mr. KILGORE. Who made the report?

Mr. OWENS. Judge Geddes, of Ohio, as good a lawyer as there is in the State of Ohio, and a Democrat, who was chairman of the Committee on War Claims, made this adverse report, and yet it has pursued its way right along here, and there seems to be no end to it.

Mr. CARUTH. Men may come and men may go, but it bobs up forever. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWENS. Yes, as my friend says, it may go on forever. We may be called upon to pay claims for blowing up all the railroads and suits for damages for men killed, and everything of that kind. We stopped at Lexington, and they wanted to replevin the slaves we had along with us, but did not succeed. Now, we can not afford to vote for this class of claims in this House, unless we intend to pay for all the harm we did. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty minutes remaining.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman state what the claim is for?

Mr. OWENS. The claim is for money. The history of it is briefly this: Down in Tennessee—in that unfortunate country, and I am sorry for them, as I went through it—Confederate soldiers made a raid on a town, and evidently were steered on to Union men by those who believed with the other side, because the soldiers, if they were soldiers, probably would not have found out what they were. They took and destroyed the property of Union men, and under some authority of the Army that has been recognized, these men who participated in this and were on the other side or sympathized with them were required to pay that money back. Now, the question is, whether we are to pay them for it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OWENS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. Have you any knowledge whether these troops were regularly enlisted troops in the service of the Confederacy, or were they guerrillas?

Mr. OWENS. They were called guerrillas, which is a very ugly name.

Mr. OATES. Were the men who destroyed this property required to pay this money?

Mr. OWENS. I understand that the men who sympathized with those who destroyed the property were required to pay it. That is what is shown in this report. Now, if anyone has any other information I would be glad to have it. If we are to pay this claim, there are others of a similar character substantially, amounting to millions of dollars, that ought to be paid, and I do not think we ought to pay this one.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do I understand that we are called upon in this bill to appropriate more money than is now in the Treasury to the credit of this fund?

Mr. OWENS. I do not know that, but I do know that we are asked to take money out of the Treasury of the United States and pay it over to men who were engaged in the late war on the side opposed to the Government to pay them for damages which they may have suffered during the continuance of the war.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not understand that that is the claim at all.

Mr. OWENS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that a contribution was levied upon the community to pay for certain damages which had been inflicted by the Confederates, that more money was collected than was necessary to pay for the damages, and that the officer, being an honest man, turned the excess into the Treasury.

Mr. OWENS. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, what business has the money there?

Mr. OWENS. By this account there was not a dollar more collected than was determined on the part of the Government to be necessary to compensate Union men.

Mr. CULBERSON. If that is the fact I do not understand the bill.

Mr. OWENS. That is exactly the fact.

Mr. HEARD. The bill appears to be a proposition to appropriate money out of any funds not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that, but some of the money that was collected was covered into the Treasury.

I understand that a Confederate raid destroyed certain property in Tennessee; that the United States officer in command of that division or department required the citizens to make good the damage done; that an assessment was made of the value of the property lost or destroyed, and also an assessment upon the citizens, fixing the amount that each man should pay to make good those damages. The officer had that money collected under duress; the citizens paid it under duress. They paid the whole amount levied, and the officer paid the parties who had lost property the amounts which they had lost.

Mr. OWENS. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. But after paying those amounts he found in his hands an excess—

Mr. OWENS. No; that is where the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. CULBERSON. And this is a bill providing for the payment of that excess back to them.

Mr. OWENS. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. CULBERSON. If I am, then I do not understand the bill.

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, the gentleman from Texas is wrong about that; as I will explain later when I take the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], who has been chairman of the Committee on War Claims for a number of years, that I am exactly right about it.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman from Kentucky answered the gentleman in that way he certainly did not understand the question, but I will explain the matter when I get the floor.

Mr. OWENS. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. OWENS. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, before entering upon any discussion of this case I desire to yield sufficient time for my colleague, Col. COX, who is present on the floor, and is the man who led that raid on Henderson Station, to make a statement. It has been referred to here as a "guerrilla" raid and it has been intimated that there was an understanding between the "guerrillas" and the citizens there that the raid should be made. Now, my colleague [Mr. COX] led the expedition, and I wish him to state the facts.

Mr. CARUTH (to Mr. COX). You are a pretty good-looking guerrilla. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] yield to his colleague?

Mr. ENLOE. Ten minutes, or more if necessary.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the facts about the capture of the troops at the place named in the bill (Henderson Station, in West Tennessee) are these: It occurred, if my memory serves me right, in the fall of 1862. The line of the Confederates, running then north and south in that portion of the country, was pretty well defined by the Tennessee River. I was regularly in the service, under the orders of Gen. Forrest, and had been in it ever since the beginning of the war, and I was stationed on that part of the line to watch the operations of the enemy upon the Tennessee River. I got information—I am speaking now from memory, for I have not thought of the subject for years—I got information that there was a company of Federal troops, belonging, I think, to an Illinois regiment, at Henderson Station, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad.

I doubtless got the information from citizens that the troops were there, but that was all. There was an old gentleman in my command, too old for the service but eager in the cause, who crossed the Tennessee River and went to Henderson Station for the purpose ostensibly of buying some salt. He went in and counted the number of men there. After he brought me back the information we swam our horses across the Tennessee about dusk and made a force march, and arrived at Henderson Station just about daylight. We surprised the troops there. They were not, I think, apprised at all of our coming. They were in the depot, and around the depot cotton bales had been laid for protection, and the telegraph wire went into the house. That was jerked out of the building, and we surrounded the house.

The troops—I do not think there was more than a good company—were all inside the building, or most of them. When I ordered them to surrender there was a little hesitation, but finally they surrendered. Those troops were turned over to Gen. Forrest, or some of his officers, and paroled. I saw in the building there a large quantity of stores which I presumed were Government stores—I did not know what else they were. As I could not carry them away I fired the house and burned them up. I also burned, or tried to burn, a bridge just beyond the depot, in order to break up communication; and some damage was done to the railroad—to what extent I can not state.

So far as the troops were concerned, they were as regular as any we had. In the following December (this was in November) we had the misfortune to be captured by Gen. Sullivan; we were acting under the immediate command of Gen. Forrest.

I have stated how the capture was made. As to the money questions involved in this matter I have no personal knowledge. I do not know personally a single man named in the bill. As to the amount of property destroyed, I can not make any statement, nor as to the persons who owned it. I heard afterward that an assessment had been made upon the citizens to repay the damages, but I know nothing of that matter from my personal knowledge.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Will the gentleman state what rank he held and what troops he commanded?

Mr. COX of Tennessee. I was major of cavalry, commanding at the time a battalion of cavalry.

Mr. BUSHNELL. What regiment?

Mr. COX of Tennessee. We were eventually consolidated with another battalion and organized into what was known in our service as the Tenth Tennessee Cavalry; at that time we had not been organized into a regiment.

Mr. BUSHNELL. They were regular Confederate troops?

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Yes, sir; we thought we were "regular." We got our pay, such as it was, and obeyed orders as well as we could. Nothing was very "regular" in those days; we had to take care of ourselves as best we could.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I am desirous that the House should understand this case, and I am satisfied when it is understood the House will have no difficulty in coming to a proper conclusion in regard to it.

This bill, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] has stated, has been pending before Congress for quite a number of years; but so far as that fact may be urged as a criticism upon the measure, I want to say in answer that the very fact that the bill has remained here and is still pending, is still being pressed, and has been so often favorably reported upon, is evidence that there is merit in the bill, for had there not been the measure would have been abandoned long ago.

Mr. BURROWS. It may be evidence simply that there is an attorney taking care of it.

Mr. ENLOE. No, there is no attorney in this case; if there is I have not seen him in the years I have been here.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the bill been reported on favorably?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir; it has been reported on favorably in several different Congresses. The report made in the Forty-sixth Congress—the report before the House to-day—was written by Gen. Bragg, of Wisconsin, the commander of the "Iron Brigade," a man who had as much of the confidence of this House while he was a member of it as any member that ever occupied a seat on this floor. Such confidence had that Congress in his judgment that when he reported this bill to the House at that time it was passed here with but a single vote against it. Since that time it has been reported adversely in the Forty-seventh Congress and also in the Forty-eighth. I will not refer to the circumstances under which this adverse action occurred, because it relates to a gentleman, then a member, now dead.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman state the facts of the case?

Mr. ENLOE. I will. I only add as cumulative evidence of the merit of the claim that it has also been twice reported favorably in the Senate; it not only passed this House once, but also passed the Senate once, with some modification from its present form, to which I will refer later.

Now, the facts are these: When this raid was made upon the post at Henderson, Tenn., of which my colleague, Col. COX, has spoken, an order was issued to levy an assessment, known as a military assessment, upon the citizens of that vicinity, to reimburse the Government for losses it sustained by the raid.

Mr. OATES. Which side made the raid?

Mr. ENLOE. The Confederate side made the raid and destroyed the property.

Now, as a military measure this assessment was levied, but it was an excessive levy. Brig. Gen. Sullivan, who was in command of the post at the time, being stationed at Jackson, Tenn., and acting under the orders of his superior, Gen. Grant, levied this assessment for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the loss which the Government sustained by the raid. Here is his affidavit, which explains his connection with it and his purpose at the time:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

Jeremiah C. Sullivan, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows, to wit: I am the Gen. J. C. Sullivan who was in command of the Department of West Tennessee when Special Order No. 15, December 12, 1862, was issued. I believed that by issuing that order guerrilla raids upon my depots and outposts would be checked. During the command of my predecessor great annoyance had been caused by such raids. Upon investigation I found such raids were made by young men, who, leaving the rebel army on furlough, would visit their homes within my lines. After they had recruited their health and horses, gathering at some selected point they would make a dash on some outpost or depot and securing the spoil and destroying the property gallop off to the army. An attack of this kind was made shortly after I took command. I did not have force enough to establish a guard in each town or at each crossroad.

I reasoned that the best way to check these raids was as far as possible to make the parents or prominent people near where these raids took place responsible for the good behavior of these young men when they came home. I did not believe that I could secure my object by imprisoning the parties referred to, knowing that the separation from their families and friends would imbibit feelings I was anxious to allay, but I knew the love of money was all-powerful in the human breast, and that if I exacted such a penalty I would have ever present with them a powerful monitor to warn them against such future attacks. On or about the 25th day of November, 1862, a raid was made upon the post of Henderson, Tenn., resulting in the destruction of a large amount of property then at said post. Upon the report of the attack at headquarters I issued Order No. 15, a copy of which I have no doubt is on file among the papers of the claimants, who ask to be reimbursed the money paid by them under that order.

Owing to the fact that all my books and papers relating to my military transactions are now in the East, and to the lapse of time, it is impossible for me to give a statement in detail of the result of Order No. 15. I can only say, in a general way, that I sent for a number of the leading and substantial citizens of the surrounding country, and having inquired into the standing and circumstances of each, I levied assessments upon a large number of such persons in proportion to the standing and ability of each, and gave them the option either to pay the respective amounts or go to Alton, with the distinct understanding between those persons and myself that the money so collected was to be held as security for the peaceful conduct of their neighborhood, and that if no more raids occurred the money was to be returned to them. A large number of the persons thus assessed consented to pay and did in fact pay the amounts assessed upon them.

After so great a lapse of time and in the absence of my books and papers, I can not from memory give the names of the persons who paid the assessments, nor the amounts paid by any of them. I know, however, that many thousands of dollars were collected, a careful and accurate record of which was made and preserved, and all the money so paid was then, to the best of my recollection, sent by me to the United States subtreasury at St. Louis, and placed on deposit under such circumstances, to the best of my recollection, as would have enabled me to withdraw it and refund it to the parties at the proper time, but in the spring of 1863 I was relieved of the command of the Department of West Tennessee and placed on Gen. Grant's staff.

Order No. 15 was not directed against parties who had been tried and convicted of complicity in the raid, but as against those whom I believed could control and discourage future raids; such parties as I believed to be influential and were interested in keeping the department quiet were selected and made to put up a money security, the amount based upon their ability in proportion to the loss sustained.

It was not intended that such money so collected should be used in any way to reimburse any person or individual who claimed a loss by such raid. That would have been insuring cotton buyers against war risks.

What I was trying to do was to preserve quiet in my department, using as few troops as possible. I did not believe that the parties from whom I collected this money participated in the raid. I issued Order No. 15 to prevent further raids by compelling the cooperation of these parties with me in my endeavor to do so. My order was a perfect success. In my opinion the relief asked for should be granted, as this money was simply a bond for good behavior and compulsory assistance in helping me maintain order and quiet.

Cotton purchasers were not looked upon with favor in Gen. Grant's command, and no officer would have dared make innocent parties pay their claims. I most positively state that it was in no manner intended by me to pay or adjust any such claims.

JEREMIAH C. SULLIVAN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 31 day of March, 1884.

[SEAL.]

JOHN E. HARVILL, Notary Public.

Mr. KILGORE. Did not Gen. Grant afterward repudiate that construction of the order?

Mr. ENLOE. I yield to the gentleman for his question, which

I answer very frankly. I will say that I have here a letter written to the Senate committee by Gen. Grant—the very last communication ever made on this subject. In this letter Gen. Grant states that Gen. Hillyer's statement made in a letter to Gen. T. M. Vincent, which was submitted to Gen. Grant, was the evidence of what occurred at the time, and that he did not levy the assessment for the purpose of reimbursing cotton purchasers. Here is that correspondence. Col. W. S. Hillyer, provost-marshal-general of the Department of Tennessee, says:

NEW YORK, July 15, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR:

In November or December, 1862, or January, 1863, Gen. Sullivan was commanding at Jackson, Tenn. At that time a bridge was fired and some damage done to Government property by guerrillas. A Union woman extinguished the fire and saved the bridge. It was represented also that about the same time a large amount of private cotton was destroyed by these guerrillas. Gen. Grant directed Gen. Sullivan to make assessments and collect the same from rebel sympathizers in the neighborhood sufficient to make good the Government losses and pay a reward of (I think) $500 to the woman who extinguished the fire.

Gen. Sullivan collected a much larger sum than was required for these purposes and reported the excess to Gen. Grant, with a statement that parties who had had cotton destroyed by guerrillas claimed that he, Gen. Grant, intended their losses should be made good to them out of this fund. Gen. Grant in reply stated that it was not true that he so intended; that the Army was not an insurance company to indemnify cotton speculators for losses in their operations, and that no part of this money rightfully belonged to them nor should be paid to them. That he did not intend that any assessment should be made in excess of an amount sufficient to indemnify the Government and reward the woman, and that his orders had been misunderstood or exceeded.

Yours, respectfully,

WM. S. HILLYER.

Gen. T. M. VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant-General, Washington, D. C.

Upon Gen. Grant's attention being called to this letter he wrote, February 25, 1882, to the Senate committee as follows:

Gen. Hillyer's letter as printed above is no doubt entirely correct. I certainly never intended any collection for the benefit of cotton purchasers.

U. S. GRANT.

In 1866, soon after the occurrence, Gen. Hillyer wrote the following letter to Maj. George K. Leet:

NEW YORK, September 3, 1866.

MAJOR: So much I got from the record from my recollection. Outside of the record I would remark that one of the claimants for indemnity for cotton lost by the rebel raid applied to me by letter at Memphis, stating that he had purchased cotton, which was his private property and which had been destroyed by the rebels on the raid near Henderson Station, and claimed that he was entitled to be indemnified out of a fund assessed and collected from rebel sympathizers by the commanding officer for that purpose.

I consulted Gen. Grant about the claim, and under his instructions disallowed it. Gen. Grant at the time stating that the army was not there for the purpose of protecting cotton-buyers, that he had never authorized subordinate commanders to make assessments upon rebel sympathizers (except) to make good damages done to Government property with one further exception, and that was to reward two Union women who had saved a railroad bridge from fire. That there was an assessment to which those from whom it was collected might have some claim, but not the speculators whose profits were regulated by the risks and whose accumulation of cotton often tempted raids which resulted not only in the destruction of their own cotton, but a loss of Government property and the lives of our soldiers.

WILLIAM S. HILLYER.

Late Provost-Marshal-General, Department Tennessee.

Maj. GEORGE K. LEET,
Assistant Adjutant-General, Headquarters Army United States.

Here we have the best evidence of the intention of the commanding officers, and Gen. Grant's last letter, February 25, 1882, ought to put at rest forever all questions as to the purpose of the officers in command in authorizing the levy.

Mr. KILGORE. Did he not, during the war, when this matter was first presented for payment, repudiate the action of his subordinate in making this levy? Did he not declare that the order under which Gen. Sullivan claimed to act was not open to the construction which was put upon it by him, and hence repudiated it?

Mr. ENLOE. Neither he nor the Department ever made any such declaration.

Mr. KILGORE. Why, that report says so.

Mr. ENLOE. No, the report does not say it. The gentleman from Texas misapprehends the report. It takes the position that the General of the Army had a right to levy the assessment, and having been levied by his subordinates in pursuance of authority, it was a legal levy. But it was claimed that the Government had no right to take from the citizens one dollar in money except to reimburse the Government. That is the position. There were some cotton speculators who came before the commission which assessed the damages, and they were afterwards before the Department and before Congress claiming to be entitled to a part of the fund arising from this assessment and asking to be reimbursed.

I have all of the documents here on my desk and shall want to incorporate them with my remarks, for if this matter is not disposed of to-day, and the House wants to look further into it, I wish them to have the full information on which to base their action. As to the rights of private citizens claiming reimbursement, Quartermaster-General Meigs made a decision embodied in a letter to the Secretary of War.

Here is his letter:

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1871.

SIR: With reference to the claim of W. N. Arnold and others, for cotton destroyed at Henderson Station, Tenn., by rebel troops, referred to this office, November 20, 1871, for report as to the liability of the Government for payment of these claims, having reference to the statement of claimants that the cotton was seized while in transit to Memphis, and used for breastworks and fortifications, and while in possession of the United States the cotton was captured and destroyed by rebels, etc., I have the honor to report:

As regards the question on which the opinion of the Quartermaster-General is called for, i. e., liability of the United States for the cotton, I find that the cotton is alleged to have been taken possession of and placed in breastworks for defense of the post of Henderson Station, and to have been destroyed by the enemy when the garrison was captured by the rebel forces.

I think that the United States is not liable for the destruction by an enemy of property thus temporarily used. The cotton piled in breastworks can not be held as actually appropriated to use of the United States. Like any other bulky packages which could be left out of doors and used in case of danger as a shelter from behind which to fire at the enemy, it would, had it been successfully defended, have been ultimately restored to the owners. The cotton does not appear to have been confiscated, seized as forfeited, or appropriated to the United States.

By law and general orders relating to captured and abandoned property, all property coming into possession of the Army was to be reported, and unless needed for military uses was to be finally turned over to the Treasury agents, charged with such expense of transportation as had been incurred by the Quartermaster's Department. But no officer of the Army had authority to pay for such property.

Cotton used for breastworks is not quartermaster stores. The proper material for breastworks is earth, with sod or wood revetment, and the provision of material for this purpose belongs to the Engineer Department, and can not be paid for by the Quartermaster-General as quartermaster stores under the law of the 4th of July, 1864.

The destruction was the act of the enemy. The United States lost largely while guarding this property, and I do not see that the United States became liable for its destruction by using the property itself as a means of protection while defending it.

Gen. Grant, then commanding, ordered a war levy upon neighboring rebels, and the full value of the United States property and of the cotton (private property) destroyed appears to have been collected. Col. Hillyer states that the money thus collected exceeded the amount which Gen. Grant had intended to have collected, and that Gen. Grant refused to permit it to be applied to the payment of private losses and damages.

Part of the contribution or levy appears to have gone into the military railroad department, being that which represents the value of public property destroyed.

Part of the remainder, namely, $30,000, went into the hands of the quartermaster, Col. C. A. Reynolds, as appears from his accounts on file at the Treasury.

In settling the accounts of officers of this department at the Treasury all these military collections, levies, rents of abandoned or captured buildings, etc., are, if their proceeds have been used in the operations of the Quartermaster's Department, charged against the regular appropriation of the Quartermaster's Department, and the amount is placed in the Treasury by transfer warrant to the credit of these irregular funds.

While it was within the military authority and power of a general in the field to levy and collect moneys as fines; and while he might have paid the proceeds to those who had been injured by the enemy, it appears that Gen. Grant refused to do this, and I know of no law by which any officer of the United States can now take the money from the Treasury and apply it to the payment of these losses and damages.

I am of opinion that the parties have no claim in law, and no officer, so far as I know, has power to relieve them.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS.

Quartermaster-General, Bt. Maj. Gen. U. S. A.

Approved.

WM. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War.

APRIL 16, 1872.

To the honorable SECRETARY OF WAR.

Washington, D. C.:

These cotton speculators made application to the Government to be reimbursed from this fund, and the Secretary of War referred the matter to Quartermaster-General Meigs, and he wrote this opinion in regard to the matter, and in tracing up the history of the fund, he traced it into the account of irregular funds in the Treasury Department, where it has been lying all of this long time awaiting the action of Congress. He absolutely refused to allow these speculators the claim that they had set up, because they had no legal right to any part of the fund. This claim created a great deal of confusion in regard to the whole matter, and it was through the efforts of these men to get payment for cotton which they claimed they had lost that this claim has been so long delayed.

The Government was not held to be liable to pay a dollar of the money that was claimed for the loss of the cotton. It was taken to build fortifications to protect the property itself. Under the rules of war the Government was not liable in any event for its destruction. He says this money was turned in—the excess of it, over and above the amount required to pay the Government damages—to the irregular fund, where it must remain for such action as Congress may see fit to take in regard to it.

Mr. OATES. What is the amount?

Mr. ENLOE. Twenty-two thousand two hundred and seventy-one dollars and twenty-six cents. Twenty-seven thousand three hundred and fifty-one dollars and thirty-six cents was the sum originally collected, but the balance, after reimbursing the Government, is what is now claimed by those who paid the assessments. Of course these people do not expect to recover from the Government what it took to reimburse itself for the loss of the property, nor a cent of interest, because the Government does not pay interest on any but its bonded debt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to be perfectly plain and fair about this matter and to answer thoroughly and conclusively all of the points that may be made against it.

Mr. KILGORE. If the gentleman will allow me a further interruption, let me ask him if this matter has not been before some court or some commission for action?

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir; not before any court or commission, or tribunal of any kind except Congress, so far as I know.

Mr. KILGORE. Has it not been before some Department of the Government, which officially ruled adversely to the claim?

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir; I have never heard of such action. I do not know of any.

Mr. KILGORE. Has there not been some question raised about the fact on this theory, that the assessment was wrongfully made by the officer in command; and has it not been held that the Government was not liable for the wrongs committed by its officers in the military service in the war?

Mr. ENLOE. You are talking of another report.

Mr. KILGORE. I so understand the report.

Mr. ENLOE. You are talking of the report that my friend from Ohio [Mr. OWENS] had read awhile ago. That is where you got that impression.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not know what it was, but that is my understanding.

Mr. ENLOE. That is not a correct impression. The only reason why the case has not been before the Court of Claims was that the court had no jurisdiction to consider it. This is on the same footing in some respects as claims for cotton that was seized and turned into the captured and abandoned property fund.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to say that with reference to the captured and abandoned property fund the time within which an opportunity was offered to bring suit in the Court of Claims has expired, and there has been no act reviving it.

Mr. ENLOE. I think they have never attempted to go to the Court of Claims with this case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not a question involving the loyalty of the parties. It can not go to the Court of Claims as cases arising under the Bowman act would go. There is no statute authorizing it. In the Bowman act cases the court must first consider the question of loyalty, and then the question of fact. But this is upon an entirely different footing, and there is not another claim that has ever been presented to Congress like it. There is no precedent for it, and it can establish no precedent for anything to come after it. There is not another case in the history of the Government like it. It is simply a measure of honesty, right, and justice; a bill to refund this money to these people from whom it was taken.

Mr. KILGORE. There is no pretense that these people were loyal to the Federal Government who paid this levy?

Mr. ENLOE. None further than this, although it does not cut a figure in the disposition of the case. I will state to the gentleman that the Federal troops had taken possession of that part of the country, and the whole of Western Tennessee was recognized as being completely under the jurisdiction and protection of the Federal Government at that time.

Mr. KILGORE. And the masses of the Confederates got to be loyal about that time, did they not, in that section?

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir; but there were quite a number of people who did, when the authority of the Federal Government was established, come forward and take the oath of allegiance, and that is what the people in that country generally did.

Mr. KILGORE. Did not the enemy have a right to depredate upon the country in which they were quartered?

Mr. ENLOE. This is not a case of supporting an army. It does not stand upon any such footing as the case of taking supplies for the support of the Army.

Mr. KILGORE. Suppose they had taken the corn and mules and cattle of disloyal people to support the Army. Would the Government be liable for that?

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman is talking about one proposition and I am talking about another.

Mr. KILGORE. I am trying to get down to what the difference would be between these two transactions. Suppose they had gone and robbed a disloyal citizen of his money.

Mr. ENLOE. That would have been a case of a tort of a soldier; and the gentleman, if he knows anything about law, knows that the Government is not liable for the torts of its soldiery.

Mr. KILGORE. Or suppose they had been ordered to go to a bank and take the money for the purpose of sustaining the Army; would the Government be liable?

Mr. ENLOE. That is not this case. This is not money taken for the purpose of sustaining the Army. It was taken for a specific purpose; and it was applied to that purpose until the Government was fully reimbursed, and this surplus was turned into the Treasury, where it is to-day, and this bill is to pay it back to its rightful owners.

Mr. POWERS. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that the full amount of this fund, $27,351.36, is in excess of the actual damage done?

Mr. ENLOE. Not the full amount.

Mr. POWERS. How much of it?

Mr. ENLOE. The report states the amount, and I will read it to the gentleman. The full amount collected was $27,351.36. This bill proposes to restore to those people $22,271.26.

Mr. POWERS. Does that represent the excess?

Mr. ENLOE. That represents the excess.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this in excess of the amount that has already been paid by act of Congress?

Mr. ENLOE. I am glad the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has called my attention to that, because I want the House to understand the claim fully. A few of these persons, who were cotton speculators and had their cotton destroyed, came to Congress subsequently and got about $9,000, which was paid them by act of Congress; and if that had been the proper and lawful thing to do, it would, of course, deprive these people of that part of the money; but it was not taken out of this money, because this was a fund held in trust for the claimants, and it could not be lawfully applied to any other purpose.

Now, I take the position that if a preceding Congress made a misappropriation of that amount of money, under a misapprehension or otherwise, it is not binding upon this Congress and should not prevent or excuse this Congress from doing justice to these claimants. It certainly would be unfair to hold that these claimants should suffer that loss when it was done without fault on their part.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman please state the variance between my statement and his?

Mr. ENLOE. I understood the gentleman to state that the officers of the Government collected this money, and that after reimbursing the Government, certain citizens who were making claims were also reimbursed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not state that.

Mr. ENLOE. Then I misunderstood the gentleman, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. BABBITT. Is this money to be returned to those who owned the property or to those who paid the tax?

Mr. ENLOE. To those who paid the money, and it is not going to attorneys. These people have been relying for years upon the justice of their claim, and I have been their attorney here in this House, and I have presented their claim here year after year. Some of them have died while awaiting tardy justice, and there are others who are living in great poverty and in need of this money, and who are waiting the action of Congress to pay them what is due them.

Mr. BABBITT. Is this money in the Treasury now, set aside for that purpose?

Mr. ENLOE. It is in the irregular funds, placed there as a distinct and separate fund.

Mr. BABBITT. To be paid to those to whom it honestly belongs?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, and there is about $10,000,000 there in what is known as the captured and abandoned property fund.

Mr. MCRAE. Why do you not pass a law which will let all the others in who are entitled to that fund? Why do you let them in one at a time?

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman ought to be fair about this. I have a great many constituents interested in the captured and abandoned property fund for cotton that was taken; but this is a separate and distinct case, and there is no reason why these people should be made to wait till Congress in its wisdom or in its tardy sense of justice may pass some measure that will provide for the others.

Mr. MCRAE. If you are going to seize that trust fund for a particular class, I think we had better wait until we give them all a chance.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman ought to understand that this does not stand upon the footing of cotton claims, classed as captured and abandoned property claims.

Mr. MCRAE. How did it get into that fund?

Mr. ENLOE. It was turned into the account of irregular funds, because it was collected in the way which has been explained here, and collected for a purpose to which the Government could not apply it, and they had no legal authority to credit it to any fund coming into the Treasury under the revenue laws.

Mr. MCRAE. If it is in that fund, I shall insist that all the people who are interested in it be heard before any of it is paid out.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to read to the gentleman what Quartermaster-General Meigs said on this subject.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not want this captured and abandoned property fund paid out to certain people to the exclusion of others. My constituents have as much right and interest in it as yours.

Mr. ENLOE. I will say to you that your constituents have not got any interest in the fund I am talking about.

Mr. MCRAE. They have got a great deal more interest than your constituents have in this captured and abandoned property fund.

Mr. ENLOE. I am talking about that particular fund.

The question had been presented as to whether there was tort or not. Now, Gen. Bragg, in his report, says:

But was this assessment a tort, within the meaning of such well-established doctrine? It is submitted that this wrong is clearly without the rule, because this assessment was collected by an officer of high rank, commanding a military district, in the execution of an office giving him colorable authority, to say the least, to do the act he did; and that act was ratified by the general commanding, impliedly at least, by not ordering restitution where the excessive assessment came to his knowledge.

But if the reasoning on this point may be deemed questionable, there is upon the facts another and complete answer to the application of this principle. The proof shows to an absolute certainty that of the money so collected $2,325.16 was applied by the United States to its use, knowing the source from whence it was derived, and the remainder of the sum, $4,025, by all reasonable presumption, was likewise applied to the use of the Government.

I was quoting from his report. Now, I want to call attention to the language of Gen. Meigs. In commenting on this fund he says:

Gen. Grant, then commanding, ordered a war levy upon neighboring rebels, and full value of the United States property and of the cotton (private property) destroyed appears to have been collected. Col. Hillyer states that the money thus collected exceeded the amount which Gen. Grant had intended to have collected, and that Gen. Grant refused to permit it to be applied to the payment of private losses and damages.

Part of this contribution or levy appears to have gone into the military railroad department, being that which represents the value of public property destroyed.

Part of the remainder, namely, $30,000, went into the hands of the quartermaster, Col. C. A. Reynolds, as appears from his accounts on file at the Treasury.

In settling the accounts of officers of this department at the Treasury, all these military collections, levies, rents of abandoned or captured buildings, etc., are, if their proceeds have been used in the operations of the quartermaster's department, charged against the regular appropriation of the quartermaster's department, and the amount is placed in the Treasury by transfer warrant to the credit of these irregular funds.

That is Gen. Meigs's statement of the disposition of this fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information, to see if I correctly understand him. Now, it appears that there was a portion of property belonging to the Government and a part to private citizens?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Now, if I understand you correctly, the value of the property belonging to the Government destroyed was $5,080, and that was paid to the Government out of the money collected under this assessment. Is that correct?

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir; that is not correct. If the gentleman will look in the report, he will find that the evidence filed shows the amount of property that belonged to the Government.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I am looking at the second page of the report.

Mr. ENLOE. You are taking a statement first filed, showing $5,080 worth of property destroyed belonging to the Government.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. If you will read on further you will find the claimants were held responsible for $1,900 worth of cotton as belonging to the Government. It subsequently appeared that the Government had no cotton, and then they figured this $3,180 as representing the actual loss by the Government.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Then, if I correctly understand the fact, that $3,180 was all the property the Government lost in that raid?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUSHNELL. The balance of the property destroyed belonged to private individuals?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir, and to the railroad company.

Mr. BUSHNELL. And under the construction of Gen. Grant's order, under which the assessment was made upon the citizens, that was withheld from being paid over to the owners of that property?

Mr. ENLOE. That is right.

Mr. BUSHNELL. And went into the Government Treasury.

Mr. ENLOE. That is right.

Mr. BUSHNELL. And is there now; and all you ask in this bill is that that money, which was wrongfully collected, be paid back to the individuals from whom it was collected, without interest?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir; to be paid back to them without interest. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a vote on the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me. The gentleman has stated that there was a letter from Gen. Grant; on what page is it given?

Mr. ENLOE. I will give it to the gentleman in one moment.

Mr. BOATNER. Has the gentleman from Tennessee yielded the floor?

Mr. ENLOE. I am about to respond to the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. ENLOE. I find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Forty-eighth Congress, page 4029. First appears the letter of Gen. Hillyer. Right following that appears this, which was sent to the Senate committee by Gen. Grant when that committee had the bill under consideration on the 25th of February, 1882. That was the last time that Gen. Grant ever expressed an opinion on the subject, and the only time. His private secretary did write a communication saying that Gen. Grant supposed that the money was intended to be paid to these people, when they were pressing the matter before Congress, but when his attention was called to the official statement he made this indorsement:

Gen. Hillyer's letter, as printed above, is no doubt entirely correct. I certainly never intended any collection for the benefit of cotton purchasers.

Mr. DINGLEY. That was before the House committee, I believe, when they reported upon the bill in the Forty-seventh Congress and in the Forty-eighth also?

Mr. ENLOE. Not in the Forty-seventh. This was in the Forty-eighth, in the Senate. Senator Jackson, of my State, reported the bill in the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. But in the House?

Mr. ENLOE. This does not appear to have been before the House committee at the time they made their report.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that it is referred to in the report.

Mr. ENLOE. I think the reference must be to something else, though I have not examined the report recently. I call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the date of the first statement. It was February 20, 1882. The House committee made an unfavorable report on that statement of February 20, I presume, but on February 25, when Gen. Grant's attention was called to Gen. Hillyer's letter and the statements contained in it, he made this indorsement that I have read and sent it with the letter to the Senate committee, and they made a favorable report. That is my understanding of the facts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the confusion of ideas into which my friend from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] has fallen with regard to the ownership by the Government of property taken under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property act. As none of his constituents were loyal to the Government during the war, and as they did not fall in the path of the armies, it seems to be impossible for him to understand how anyone can have a just claim against the Government, and he seems to think that the defeat of every claim that comes up here is in the line of "retrenchment, economy, and reform." [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. Is the gentleman undertaking to lecture me or to explain this bill? I would rather go into the cloakroom if I have got to take a lecture. I do not want to be publicly lectured without an order of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman. I was replying, or about to reply, to the questions which he asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] who was advocating this bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact in this case is that in the Treasury of the United States there is a certain sum of money which belongs to these people, unless some act has been done by the Government or by themselves which has deprived them of its ownership.

It appears that it was collected from them by a military assessment, and that after it had been collected there was found to be an excess which was not applied to the purposes for which the money was collected, but was paid into the Treasury. Now, the Government did not collect that money as a tax. The Government did not collect it as a capture of war. The Government did not collect it as a forced contribution upon the people for the support of its armies. It required that this money should be collected for a certain specific purpose, to wit, reimbursement for damages which had been sustained from a raid which it was supposed had been made by guerrillas, but which it now appears was made by the regular troops of the Confederacy. But it is argued that this money ought not to be paid back because these people were disloyal to the Government, and that therefore the money having been taken from them, whether rightfully or wrongfully, it ought not to be paid back.

I other words, that the Government should profit by its own wrong, that money which the Government does not own, and which it now appears was improperly taken from these people, ought to be held in the Treasury regardless of the equity or justice of the case. The very same argument has been made by the gentleman from Texas and by other gentlemen upon this floor against reimbursing people in the Southern States for the proceeds of cotton taken under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property act. In many instances the cotton was taken by officers of the Government after the cessation of hostilities, and it was sold and the proceeds turned into the Treasury. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that that fund is a trust fund, that it belongs to these people, that the Government holds it merely in trust for the owners.

The Government never has treated it as its own property; and yet, in face of the manifest equity of the case, the absolute justice of the case, in face of the fact that this money has been lying there for over twenty years and that the highest judicial authority in the country has decreed and declared that the money belongs to the citizens and not to the Government, upon such objections and such arguments as have been heard here to-day this House fails or refuses to do justice by refunding to these people the money which the highest courts in the land have declared belongs to them.

Mr. BUSHNELL. If I correctly understood the gentleman's remarks, he stated that there was a misapprehension as to whether these damages were done by regular troops or by guerrillas. Now, if the damage had been done by guerrillas would there have been any authority, under any orders in force at the time, for levying and collecting the losses of private individuals out of the inhabitants of the country?

Mr. BOATNER. I apprehend none at all, unless it was supposed that these private individuals or the community upon whom the assessment was made were in concert with the guerrillas, and were parties to the raid.

Mr. BUSHNELL. But suppose the damages were to private individuals and not to Government property?

Mr. BOATNER. I do not understand that there was any lawful authority for it; but if the Government had made the assessment and distributed the money among these people it might be considered a part of the ravages of war for which the Government could not be responsible. But the Government having assessed a tax to reimburse certain losses, whether to private individuals or to itself, and there remaining of this fund so collected a surplus which was not applied to that purpose, but covered into the Treasury, certainly there can be no reason in law, equity, or justice why the money should not be restored to the people from whom it was taken.

As I have remarked, the gentleman from Texas seems to think that whatever goes into the maw of the Treasury becomes at once the property of the United States and ought to be held on to, rightfully or wrongfully; that no part of it ought to be taken out in order to do justice to citizens of the United States. I do not understand upon what principle any such contention can be based. This money is in the Treasury; the Government has conceded that it is not the property of the Government by covering it into the captured and abandoned property fund. It is held there as a trust fund. The courts have decided that reimbursement ought to be made—

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEARD. I understood the gentleman to affirm just now that this money had been covered into the captured and abandoned property fund.

Mr. BOATNER. Yes.

Mr. HEARD. Now, I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] to affirm just as positively that it was not in that fund.

Mr. BOATNER. Either the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee or I did not. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to state distinctly that the balance of this fund, after the people had been paid who were to be paid, or after the Government had been reimbursed its losses, was covered into the captured and abandoned property fund. Was I not correct?

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Tennessee read a statement from an official source which certainly conveyed to my mind the impression that the money was in a different fund.

Mr. ENLOE. I will read what Quartermaster-General Meigs said about this matter when some private parties applied for reimbursement.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman can read that in his own time. I will ask him whether he did not state that the balance of this fund, after reimbursing certain damages, was covered into the captured and abandoned property fund?

Mr. ENLOE. I was under that impression at first; but afterward my attention was called to this statement of the Quartermaster-General, from which it would seem that the money received by the Government from the sale of cotton is not mentioned in that letter as belonging to this fund, but this money is referred to as among other irregular funds.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Tennessee, in the course of his statement, to say that this bill proposed to reimburse citizens for an enforced assessment levied upon individuals; that the balance of the fund, after repairing the damages which had been done by this raid, had been paid into the Treasury to the credit of the captured and abandoned property fund. If that is not so, I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. ENLOE. Let me read this; it is very short.

Mr. BOATNER. I prefer to conclude my remarks; and then the gentleman can resume the floor. Whether the money was covered into that fund or not does not affect the principle underlying this case. If the Government collected this money for a specific purpose and did not apply it to that purpose, or if there was more than sufficient to satisfy the purposes for which the assessment was levied, it seems to me that in justice and equity this balance should be repaid to the people from whom it was collected.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ENLOE resumed the floor.

Mr. STORER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, in order that I may more clearly understand this case. The amount collected was $27,351.36, I believe.

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORER. And the amount due the Government and paid to it for Government property destroyed was something like $5,000, leaving twenty-one or twenty-two thousand dollars—

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will allow me. It appears that $9,606 has been paid to private citizens out of that fund.

Mr. STORER. I was coming to that point. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to state whether out of this fund now sought to be paid back entire there has already been paid to private citizens for private property destroyed in this very raid nine thousand-odd dollars.

Mr. ENLOE. I stated, Mr. Chairman, that certain citizens—cotton speculators—had cotton destroyed at the time of this raid—burned up, as stated by my colleague [Mr. COX of Tennessee], when the depot was burned. They came here and applied for repayment. They first went to Gen. Grant and he refused the application. Then, following the matter up, they applied to the Department, and Quartermaster-General Meigs stated that this money could not be paid to them because it was not collected for any such purpose. And then they came to Congress and asked Congress to pass an act to pay them for the losses they sustained by the raid.

And I say, Mr. Chairman, if you are going to adjust the claim on the principles of justice, right, and equity, that this Congress, no matter if another preceding Congress did take money from the Treasury and pay it out to citizens who claimed to have sustained losses there, has no right to take this money which belongs to the citizens who paid it and hold it to repay the amount so taken out. Those people had no claim whatever upon this money. No portion of it could have been legally paid to them. If a former Congress made a mistake and committed a wrong, that is no reason why this Congress should repeat the mistake and ratify the wrong. If another Congress undertook to take care of certain citizens deemed unfortunate because of their alleged losses it is no reason why these claimants should now be denied their manifest rights. There is no reason in conscience and right why this Congress should do an act of injustice like this.

Mr. STORER. If the gentleman will allow a further interruption, the report in this case seems to imply the idea that it is the opinion of the committee that the general commanding might have made an assessment which would have covered all of these losses.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, sir—

Mr. STORER. And permit me a moment further. The assumption was made as if he had so ordered. That money is now in the Treasury, or at least about $22,000 of it. Is it not, then, equity that if $9,000 had been paid out of other moneys in the Treasury to people who might have been covered by this act, but who, technically perhaps, the gentleman will say, are not entitled to it, is it not right that that sum should be deducted from the balance remaining in the Treasury, and instead of being turned back to the people, should be retained to reimburse the Treasury itself? If the general commanding had failed to make the order, which he had a jurisdictional right to do, and the money is here, is it not right to take that $9,000 out of it before returning the balance?

Mr. ENLOE. I think perhaps I can best answer that by an illustration. Some gentleman in my friend's district might have been elected to Congress to draw the salary he is drawing. The people had a right to elect him, but did not. Now, if that gentleman should come here to Congress and claim that it would be right to give him half the salary because the people of his district had a right to elect him to draw the whole of it, would the gentleman think it right for Congress to recognize his late competitor's claim and give him half the salary? I think that is a fair parallel.

The legal principle involved is set forth very clearly by Gen. Bragg in the report accompanying the bill. He says:

The law of the case, then, may be stated to be, that if the officers, agents of the Government, committed a tort originally, it was approved by the principal, the Government, when it knowingly accepted the benefits of the tortious acts. And no proceedings by way of confiscation or condemnation have ever been had to divest the persons so assessed of their right in the surplus fund.

You would not insist that a proceeding by act of Congress here would divest these people of their right, or confiscate the fund, when it was not so stated expressly. There is no constitutional provision or statute under which they could be divested in that way. They have a right to this fund, and they have waited all these years for it. They paid it into the Treasury, and they certainly have a right to be reimbursed.

The Constitution declares that:

No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

No one will pretend that any legal proceeding has been had to extinguish the right of these claimants to this money.

Mr. STORER. What becomes of the argument that this money is in the hands of the Government as a trustee?

Mr. ENLOE. It is in the hands of the Government as a trustee simply because the Government by legal intent received it as such.

Mr. STORER. And $9,000 of the trust fund has gone out.

Mr. ENLOE. No matter whether it has or not. The trustee can not take advantage of his own wrong. It is not the identical money that was turned into the Treasury that is to be refunded, but it is an equal amount of money. This specific fund is there to meet the demand upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Tennessee does not undertake to say that this specific fund is there, separate and apart from all other funds, but only as a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. ENLOE. I mean that this separate amount is carried on the books in that way. It is treated on the books of the Treasury Department as a separate fund and distinctly as a trust fund.

Mr. TERRY. What fund does the bill provide that this money shall be paid out of?

Mr. ENLOE. Out of the Treasury, of course.

Mr. HEARD. But out of what fund does it come?

Mr. ENLOE. It does not provide that it shall come out of any particular fund.

Mr. HEARD. But that is just the question at issue. If the bill passes, what fund will be charged with the repayment of this money?

Mr. ENLOE. Why, I presume it will come out of the Treasury just where it went in and in the same way that it went in. It was placed to the credit of irregular funds, and when Congress directs that it shall be paid out, it may be that that particular fund will be credited on the books of the Treasury with the payment. I am not familiar with the method of bookkeeping in the Treasury, but I presume that that would be the course pursued.

To show to the House how the justice of this claim is recognized, and how far it is freed from political prejudice, I will quote from a letter of Col. Fielding Hurst, who was a neighbor to these people, and the severest man in politics and in war that Tennessee ever knew. Speaking of this claim, he said:

I am satisfied their claims are just and correct, and believe it is and would be nothing but an act of justice that the United States should refund the money. And I am further satisfied that each and every good, law-abiding, honest citizen, without distinction of party, in this community, who knows the facts, would rejoice to know the Government had passed the bill and that the claims had been paid to the parties as named in the bill, and were I in the House I would not only vote for but would urge the immediate passage of the bill for the relief of these most just and honorable claims of the parties.

Col. Hurst was the colonel of a Federal regiment during the war, and a prominent Republican after the war; but he believed in doing justice to these claimants, and he correctly represented public sentiment in his statement.

Mr. HEARD. If my friend will allow me, the question I want to ask him is this: Would the payment of this money effect a reduction in the fund called the captured and abandoned property fund or would it not? That is a question which seems to be in some doubt.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman is sufficiently familiar with the system of bookkeeping in the Treasury Department probably he can understand this language here. I confess that I do not know.

Mr. HEARD. I confess to the gentleman that I do not know from the language he read whether it would come out of that fund or not, but it seemed to me that the language seemed to refer to some other irregular fund about which I have no knowledge.

Mr. ENLOE. That may be; and I am very candid in saying to the gentleman that I think this money ought to be paid to these people, because it is an exceptional case, clearly made out, and it ought not to await action in any other different class of cases.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand your statement is that this $9,000 has been paid out of the Treasury from "any fund not otherwise appropriated." I understand you to say that on that account this $22,000 remains as a trust fund in the Treasury. Now, if this bill passes—

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not understand the fact to be as the gentleman states.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not so understand either, but that is the gentleman's statement. If the bill passes, this comes out of any fund not otherwise appropriated, and I understand the gentleman to claim that this trust fund will remain intact.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman wants to get at the system of bookkeeping in the Treasury Department he will have to consult the Treasury officials. I do not know whether or not they would pay any attention at all to this discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. Was it not your argument that the $22,000 remains there as a trust fund?

Mr. ENLOE. I say it does.

Mr. BUTLER. Because the $9,000 was paid out of another fund.

Mr. ENLOE. It does not make any difference what fund it was paid out of. The Government is responsible for this money as a trustee.

Mr. BUTLER. Then after you have paid this whole amount of $22,000 out of another fund, I understand you to claim that the whole amount will still remain there as a trust fund?

Mr. ENLOE. That is the gentleman's assumption. It does not make any difference what fund it is paid from.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not very logical.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not want gentlemen to take the whole of my time. Let gentlemen who are opposed to this bill get time from the gentleman from Ohio. Let us have a vote on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On this particular question, in 1888, Mr. Rowell of Illinois, who was then a member of the Committee on War Claims, when this particular bill was under consideration, gave a very thorough discussion to this question; and for the benefit of the members of the House I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois as a part of my own remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill marks a new departure in the way of paying war claims. Col. Haynie, when commanding at Henderson, West Tennessee, adopted as a method of preventing injury to the property of the United States and of citizens, the making of assessments, when injury was done, upon the rebel citizens thereabout, and collecting those assessments to the full amount of the injury. This was a policy adopted by different commanders in West Tennessee. Some required citizens in neighborhoods where guerrillas were in the habit of doing damage, to give bonds of indemnity against any such damage; others adopted the policy of assessment upon the active rebel sympathizers in the vicinity. Damage to the extent of some $20,000 was done in the neighborhood of Henderson; and Col. Haynie assessed and collected that sum of money, appointing a commission to find out the total amount of damage, the ability of persons to pay, and the character of the people upon whom assessments were made.

That sum of money was collected. Some $5,000 of it was for damage to United States property, and about $20,000 for damage to individual property. The money was covered into the Treasury of the United States. Every cent of it was assessed according to the laws of war, according to the rights of the people of the United States, and against men actively in sympathy with or aiding the cause of the enemy.

Subsequently—and here is a strange remissness on the part of the Committee on War Claims—subsequently, by act of Congress, between $9,000 and $10,000 of this money was paid out of the Treasury to certain parties whose property had been destroyed, leaving, besides the $5,000 going to the United States, $10,000 or $12,000 of that money remaining in the Treasury. That fact has not been stated in this report.

The Committee on War Claims, in bringing in their report, have neglected to inform this House that by the deliberate act of Congress nearly $10,000 of this money has already been paid to parties for whose benefit it was assessed, and is now not in the Treasury. But the committee has reported a bill not simply to pay the balance of the money remaining in the Treasury, but to pay to these men who were engaged in hostilities against the United States, or who were in sympathy with those who were so engaged, not alone the money remaining, but all the money that was collected, except the $5,000 collected for the benefit of the United States.

In the Forty-eighth Congress the Committee on War Claims, by a unanimous vote, reported in favor of repaying the remaining money to the parties for whose benefit it was assessed, and by an equally unanimous vote reported against a bill of this character, except that it was then only proposed to pay the balance of money remaining in the Treasury.

Now, what is this bill? It is a bill to reverse the action of the authorities of the United States in command. It is a bill to pay back to rebel sympathizers something taken by lawful authority from them in pursuance of the business which they had in hand to overthrow the rebellion.

Now, if this money is to be paid back there is no single item of damage arising out of the war and incurred for the purpose of putting down the rebellion that ought not also to be paid back. Not a single item. Wherever a marching army levied contributions, wherever a marching army camped, wherever a marching army seized upon property contraband of war there ought to be payment made to the owners thereof in principle if this money ought to be paid back.

As a member of the committee in the Forty-eighth Congress, over which Judge Geddes presided, I joined in the report in favor of paying this money to the parties injured and for whom it was assessed. I had some personal experience myself in this section of country in adopting a different plan for the purpose of saving the railroad bridges from destruction by guerrilla bands, whereby prominent people in the neighborhood were put under bond. But in this case the damages were assessed and collected. The only mistake made by the military authorities was in not paying it to the parties injured and for whose benefit the money was collected. It was covered into the Treasury of the United States and there was no way of getting it out except by legislation of Congress.

Here is a proposition, Mr. Chairman, to reverse the action of former Congresses. Here is a proposition to pay money collected in furtherance of the purpose of the Union Army in order to compensate Union men for injuries done to them. Here is a proposition to pay back this money so collected and assessed, because of injury done by these guerrilla bands, and collected and assessed in pursuance of war authority.

I want this House and country to know, before they vote this money out of the Treasury of the United States, that they are voting in fact to pay every war claim which may be presented to the House. The collection of this money stands on higher authority than the seizure of supplies. It was done deliberately; it was done after the appointment of a commission; it was done in pursuance of authority recognized by all nationalities engaged in war; it was done as a war measure; it was done by the Union forces for the purpose of putting down the rebellion; it was done to protect from depredation this section of country where there was no rebel army, and where nobody entered except in pursuance of a raid or by the boys coming home from the South in the guise of citizens getting together, and while getting ready to go back to the army rushing into a town and committing depredations. It was made necessary to assess these damages for the purpose of guarding property from attack in this section of country, so that the troops might go to the front. It was an effective remedy. It ended that sort of raiding. It relieved the soldiers from that duty and enabled them to be put upon active duty at the front.

Now, in the Fiftieth Congress we are asked to overturn that action. We are asked to declare that the action of the Army in pursuance of its legitimate purpose is to be reversed, and these people are to be compensated for the moneys they were compelled to pay as a penalty for the injury they inflicted upon the property of Union people. For one I protest. If this policy is to be adopted then I say we ought to pay everybody. Let down the gates, unlock the Treasury, pay for every bale of cotton, pay for every ear of corn, aye, let us go further and pay for every liberated slave, for the rent of every church and school-house occupied by a passing army; pay for every claim and all the claims which may be set up by those who were in the armies in rebellion against the country, because there is no difference between one and the other.

I do not care to pursue the matter further, and will yield the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Thomas].

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if we can not have a vote on this bill now?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. As many as are in favor of the motion will say "aye."

(The affirmative vote was taken.)

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I have some inquiries that I desire to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The House was dividing before the gentleman from Maine addressed the Chair.

The question being taken; the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BURROWS) there were—ayes 52, noes 45.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point that no quorum has voted; and the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

The committee again divided.

Pending the count,

Mr. ELLIS said: I move a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the tellers have not made the final report yet.

After further time spent in the count,

The CHAIRMAN said: The committee will rise, so as to be enabled to execute the order of the House.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the Chair allow the vote to be announced?

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills upon the Private Calendar, and had instructed him to report the bill (H. R. 1466) for the relief of the personal representatives of Henry H. and Charlotte K. Sibley, with an amendment, with a favorable recommendation; and that the committee also had under consideration a bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, can the committee rise without a motion?

The SPEAKER. The committee must rise in order to enable the House to execute its orders.

Mr. ENLOE. Then the committee can rise without a motion?

The SPEAKER. The committee must rise when there is an order of the House which it is required to execute.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARWICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. 97) to fill vacancies which will occur in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on April 21, 1892.

An act (H. R. 8001) to authorize a national bank at Chicago, Ill., to establish a branch office upon the grounds of the World's Columbian Exposition.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WARNER, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. RAYNER, for to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. PAGE of Maryland, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GRADY, for to-morrow, April 30, on account of important business.

To Mr. SNODGRASS, for this evening's session, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LIND, for two weeks, from this day.

To Mr. BRYAN, for to-morrow, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock by the Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

The question was put.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a division, so as to know how many are present.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 0.

Mr. KILGORE. I think we better wait awhile and see if any others come in. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 41.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 41, the noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole under the special order, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

MRS. LAURA E. SKEELS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1742) for the relief of Mrs. Laura E. Skeels.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be paid to Mrs. Laura E. Skeels the pension and arrearages which were due her mother, Mrs. Nancy M. Elmendorf, under pension certificate 189,143.

The amendments reported by the committee are as follows:

In line 5, after the words "Skeels the" insert the word "accrued;" in the same line, after the word "pension," strike out the words "and arrearages;" also in the same line, after the word "which," strike out the word "were" and insert in lieu thereof the word "was."

In line 8, after the words "and forty-three," insert the following words: "After deducting the amount already paid under section 4718, Revised Statutes, as reimbursement for funeral expenses."

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on that bill again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside without prejudice. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MRS. JENNIE B. MORRIS.

The next business reported was the bill (H. R. 1338) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie B. Morris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Jennie

B. Morris, of Des Moines, Park County, Iowa, as the widow of George H. Harris, late a teamster in the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, and pay her a full widow's pension from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the Calendar number?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report this bill, and hereafter he will report the Calendar number.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well also to announce what committee reports the bill. It is difficult to find them on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee hereafter.

Mr. DUNGAN. The Clerk did not report the Calendar number.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk did not report it, because the bill has no Calendar number.

Mr. BUTLER. By some accident it has been left off the Calendar, and that is why I rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that this bill was considered by the committee at its former session and the amendments agreed to, but the Clerk failed to place the bill on the Calendar, and therefore the number is not given. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if we did not stop last Friday evening at Calendar No. 348.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised this bill was passed over by the committee.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the bill was considered in the Committee of the Whole on last Friday night, the amendments were adopted, and the Committee of the Whole voted by a large majority in favor of the bill, but there being no quorum it was passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that, and the Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. BUTLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1339) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie B. Morris, submit the following report:

This applicant, Jennie B. Morris, was the widow of George H. Harris, late a teamster in the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, and, as such widow, she was pensioned under certificate No. 9222, under the name of Jane Harris, which pension she continued to receive until she was married to Mr. E. T. Morris, August 10, 1877.

Said marriage proved a very unhappy one, with no alleged fault on the part of this claimant, and on April 14, 1887, the district court of Polk County, Iowa, did grant a decree of divorce legally separating the parties to said marriage, and leaving this claimant entirely dependent on her own labor for support.

Evidence, to establish the excellent character of this claimant, Mrs. Jennie B. Morris, is furnished by numerous prominent citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, among them Hon. Gilbert B. Pray, clerk of the supreme court of Iowa, Isaac Brandt, postmaster of Des Moines, Iowa, and John R. Shaffer, secretary of the State Fair Association, of Iowa.

This claimant is now in destitute condition, and greatly in need of the pension formerly received and now asked to be restored, as evidenced by many of the best of Des Moines citizens.

All the alleged facts in this case are also directly sustained by declarations of Hon. J. A. T. HULL, member of Congress from the Seventh district of Iowa in this House.

The case appears to be a worthy one, and in harmony with numerous precedents.

Wherefore, your committee reports back the bill with the recommendation that it be amended as follows: Strike out the word "Park" in the fifth line, and insert in its stead the word "Polk," so as to read "Polk County, Iowa;" also, add to the last clause of said bill the following: "And during the continuance of her present unmarried state," and that as so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I think we "pulverized" this bill here last Friday night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendments have already been agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, the bill was up and under discussion last Friday night for about an hour.

Mr. HULL. And did it not pass the Committee of the Whole by a very decided majority?

Mr. KILGORE. I would not like to commit myself about that. Perhaps we may have broken up on this bill.

Mr. HULL. In order that business might go on, and that the point of a quorum might not be raised, I consented that the bill be passed over for that night without prejudice.

Mr. KILGORE. Then it stands as it did?

Mr. HULL. It stands with all the amendments adopted, and is now before the Committee of the Whole for final action.

Mr. KILGORE. This is the case where the lady married a lawyer, is it not?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. There is one fact which I would like to find out which did not come out in the discussion last Friday night. Who was it that brought the suit for divorce, this lady or her husband?

Mr. HULL. By consent, he brought it.

Mr. KILGORE. Why was that?

Mr. HULL. He could pay the expenses, and she could not. A letter of his was before the committee stating that the divorce was on account of no fault of his wife. The fault was on his side; on that account she left him; and by an arrangement between them he obtained the divorce on the ground of her desertion. This woman was married before the war to the man on account of whose military services the pension was granted and lived with him for years after the war until he died. She is what is called a war widow. During the war she suffered possibly as much as some of the "boys" in the field. She is of course entitled to much more consideration than if she had married the soldier after the war.

Mr. KILGORE. She was pensioned on account of the services of her first husband?

Mr. HULL. Yes; and she made a mistake in marrying a second time. But this second marriage has saved the Government the payment of the pension from 1877 until the present time.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, if the Government has made anything in this matter—

Mr. HULL. Yes, we made that much. [Laughter.]

The bill as amended was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

HARMON H. McELVEY.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5342) granting a pension to Harmon H. McElvey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harmon H. McElvey, of Mitchell County, Ga., late a private in Capt. G. R. McElvey's company of Florida Volunteers, in the war of 1836, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5342) granting a pension to Harmon H. McElvey, have given the same due consideration, and respectfully report as follows:

The records of the War Department show that Harmon H. McElvey was enrolled December 10, 1840, in Capt. McElvey's company, First Florida Mounted Militia, Florida war, to serve three months, and that he was mustered out of service with the company March 14, 1841, at Charles Ferry, East Florida, as sergeant.

Nathaniel Bradford and J. J. Sapp, citizens of Mitchell County, Ga., testify that they are well acquainted with the claimant and know that he is debilitated and enfeebled by age and infirmity, and that he has no means of support, but is dependent for a living upon those who are not legally bound to care for him.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

ELIZA M. BOATRIGHT.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5734) granting a pension to Eliza M. Boatright, the surviving widow of Alexander M. Boatright, who was a soldier in the Black Hawk war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Eliza M. Boatright, the widow of Alexander M. Boatright, who served as a private soldier in Captain Houston's company of Col. Sanford's volunteers, Illinois militia, in the Black Hawk war, and pay her a pension of $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina) was read as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5734) granting a pension to Eliza M. Boatright, have considered the same and report.

Mrs. Boatright is the widow of Alexander M. Boatright, who served as a private in Capt. Alexander M. Houston's company, Second Regiment, Second Brigade of Illinois Mounted Volunteers, Black Hawk war, which was called into service by proclamation of the governor dated May 15, 1833, and marched from home June 2, 1832, and was mustered out of service August 15, 1832.

The muster roll of the company (the only roll of the organization on file at the War Department) reports Alexander Boatright, a private, enlisted in Crawford County for ninety days, and furloughed at Fort Hamilton "to go home August 1."

The marriage of the claimant to the said soldier is shown by a verified copy of the public record of the same, and the fact and date (August 21, 1830) of the soldier's death are shown by the testimony of R. L. Weddington, of Brazos, Tex.

J. A. Myers and R. L. Weddington, of the above-named place, testify that the only property owned by the claimant is a little home at Bryan, Tex., worth about $800, and that she has to depend upon a married son for support. She was married to the soldier in 1850.

Your committee, believing the bill to be meritorious, respectfully recommend its passage, with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $15 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee fixing the rate of pension at $15 per month instead of $20.

Mr. KILGORE. Who introduced this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. KILGORE. He is not well; and I will not make any "row" about this. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE. I move to amend the amendment of the committee so as to make the pension $12 per month. There are no extraordinary circumstances stated in this case, and no reason is shown why this woman should receive more than other widows.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 23, noes 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair voting in the affirmative, the amendment is agreed to.
The amendment as amended was adopted, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

MARY GATLIN.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to Mary Gatlin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Gatlin, widow of John H. Gatlin, a soldier of the war of 1836, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina) was read as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to Mary Gatlin, have considered the same and report as follows:

The husband of the claimant, John H. Gatlin, was a member of Capt. Swinney's company, Douglass Battalion of Georgia Volunteers, Indian war of 1836; entered service March 3, 1836, and was mustered out June 3, 1836. It is shown by the sworn testimony of L. A. Houser, B. F. Avant, and W. M. Boon, disinterested citizens of Houston County, Ga., that she is 70 years old, and totally disabled by rheumatism in the right shoulder; also, that she is wholly dependent on her relatives for support, who are themselves unable to support her.

In view of the claimant's great age and necessities, and in the light of numerous precedents for the proposed legislation, your committee regard the case as a proper one for the allowance and relief prayed for, and the passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

DAVID C. BARROW.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5363) granting a pension to David C. Barrow.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David C. Barrow, a soldier of the Indian war of 1836, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5363) granting a pension to David C. Barrow, have considered the same and report as follows:

The claimant was a member of Capt. Seymour's company, Cooper's Battalion Georgia Volunteers, Indian war of 1836. He was enrolled February 13, 1836, to serve three months, and is reported on the muster-out roll of said company, dated May 15, 1836, as having been discharged at Picolata March 19. It is shown by the sworn testimony of John A. Cobb, a citizen of Sumner County, Ga., that claimant is 76 years of age, infirm from age, and his financial condition is such that he needs for his support the amount asked for as a pension.

The passage of the bill is respectfully recommended by the committee.

Mr. LANE. I move to amend this bill so as to make the rate of pension $15 per month instead of $20.

Mr. BUTLER. We passed a bill a short time ago at $12 per month, and the next one at $20 per month, for the same war, and now we are trying to pass one at $15 per month. It seems to me that we had better try to harmonize these rates and establish some general rule.

Mr. LANE. In the case to which the gentleman refers the pensioner was disabled. That is the difference. I am informed that in this case also the man is disabled, although the report does not so state and therefore, I withdraw my amendment.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AARON V. HAMILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 5383) to increase the pension of Aaron V. Hamilton, late a member of Fremont's battalion, Mexican war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Aaron V. Hamilton, of Lincoln County, Mo., late a member of Gibson's company, Fremont's battalion, in the war with Mexico, be increased from the sum of $8 per month to the sum of $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. NORTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5383) increasing the pension of Aaron V. Hamilton, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Capt. Gibson's company, Fremont's battalion, California Volunteers, and served from October 7, 1846, to November 11, 1847, in the war with Mexico. He is now receiving a pension at $8 per month under the Mexican war service pension act of January 29, 1857.

In support of the bill the gentleman who introduced the same in the House certifies from personal knowledge that Mr. Hamilton is 72 years old, a broken-down, decrepit old man, wholly incapacitated for manual labor; also, that he is without property, real or personal, and has no income except the small pension he is now drawing. Further, that he has no family except a married daughter whose financial condition is such that she is unable to assist her father, and he is now supported by living around among his neighbors and friends; also, that he is a sober and worthy man.

The passage of this bill is recommended.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Senate has passed a bill at this session raising the pensions of Mexican soldiers from $8 to $12 a month, and it will doubtless come over here for action before long. It seems to me that $20 a month is too much. It is more than enough to support a man even in these hard times. If we keep on increasing these pensions there will not be money enough to go around, and I think that $15 a month ought to be sufficient in this case. I therefore move to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. SIMPSON. It might be well to inquire whether this man has a family to support.

Mr. LANE. He has not. The report so states.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE] has said on this subject, I intend to depart from my usual custom (which is, not to participate in the debate upon these pension bills) far enough to say that I enter my protest here and now against this indiscriminate raising of pensions granted for service in the Mexican war above the limit of $8 up to $12, $15, or $20, as may suit the member introducing the bill, who usually fortifies the proposition by his own certificate as to the man's necessities.

We may just as well look the matter squarely in the face and realize that having entered upon this enlargement of the service pension from $8 to $12, $15, or $20, every member upon this floor who has one of these Mexican soldiers in his district will be called upon to bring the pension of that soldier up to the maximum limit, and he will have no rest until he does it. If there is to be an increase of this service pension the fair and proper way to make it is, as has been proposed in the Senate, by a general law which shall be uniform in its operation.

I tell you now, gentlemen, it will be impossible for any man in this Congress, or in any future Congress after you shall have entered upon this character of legislation, to meet the demands that will be made upon him by the soldiers living in his district. And it is not unnatural that it should be so. This is not a correct way to legislate. This pension for service in the Mexican war was not granted with reference to the individual needs or individual disabilities of the veterans; it was fixed at $8 a month regardless of special needs or disabilities. Provision had already been made for pensioning for disabilities, according to the nature thereof. It was granted as a service pension.

Now, if we go loosely along departing from the rule according to the demands of each member who may introduce a bill and his personal knowledge of the necessities of the beneficiary of his bill, the man's inability to earn a living, and so on—if we go on in that way and have no positive rule to govern our conduct, we shall be piling up for each and every one of us a heavy burden for the days to come. It is not right in principle and for that reason we shall have a great deal of trouble from it if we continue this course. I do not believe we ought to do it. We ought to make a general rule, applicable to all these cases and then we should adhere to that rule.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to enter at length into a discussion of this subject; but it does seem to me that this is a case of merit; and that $20 a month for this old man, 73 years of age, who, as I understand from the reading of the report, served more than a year in the Mexican war, is not too much. He certainly will not live long to be a charge upon this Government. When the Government needed a soldier, he went forth and served faithfully. He is now an old man, a poor man, and $20 per month in his old age is not more than sufficient to support him.

Now, I believe in this doctrine that when a man who has been a faithful soldier, who served his Government, imperiled his life in its behalf, gets old, if poor, the Government shall take care of him, and take care of him well. This Government is able to do it, and I believe that if we would maintain our dignity and character amongst the nations of the earth, we should take care of our soldiers. Those who served in the Mexican war, Mr. Chairman, are few in number, and deserve our care. They will soon be gone forever. They are old, and many of them are in want. Then let us act generously toward them; let us show them that we recognize their merits and their services, and let us not be stingy towards them. Let them go down to their graves well cared for by their Government. I believe this to be the duty that we owe to them, and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I had no desire to antagonize this particular bill, because I do not doubt for one moment that it is just as full of merit as any other claim of its particular class. But I did arise to express my view as to what I believe to be the error that Congress is falling into in the granting of this kind of pensions. I do not think that there should be such broad discrimination as is being made in these cases. This soldier is a resident of my State, in one of my neighboring districts.

I have not one solitary word to say in disparagement of his merit; but I simply desire to call my friend's attention, and that of other members, to the fact that all the soldiers of the Mexican war are now old men, and most of them are infirm in health in addition to their years; and I desire only to impress upon the gentleman from Illinois and others that I believe the only way to escape serious trouble in regard to this matter, and avoid all charges of discrimination, is to fix on some sum that we believe to be a fair and equitable rate of pension, and allow it to all applicants of the same class alike; that is to say, to all who are entitled to pensions and who fall within that particular class.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Now, as to these old men, survivors of the Mexican war, can the House, in the opinion of the gentleman, adopt a general rule that will be justly applicable to all of them?

Mr. HEARD. I think so.

Mr. RAY. I should be perfectly willing to take each case by itself and consider it upon its particular merits and grant the pension according to the needs of the individual, if we pension any at all.

A MEMBER. That is just what we seek to do.

Mr. HEARD. If that is the judgment of the House, Mr. Chairman, I shall submit and accept the judgment of this body as against my own personal opinion. But it has been held by Congress in legislating heretofore for this class of citizens, that we should fix a regular rate which was applicable to all these soldiers alike. The Mexican soldiers were provided a service pension by the general law of $8 per month. Now we are attempting to depart from that rule and allow some $12, some $15, and some $20, and that I regard to be a serious error. I think that we should fix a regular rate of pension at $12 per month, and sustain it in all cases. I understand that a substitute has been adopted in the Senate for a House bill, increasing this rate to $12 per month. If that rate is too low let it be increased, and in that view of the case I am always willing to vote for any reasonable increase that may be proposed to these Mexican soldiers as a class.

But I only insist, Mr. Chairman, that we should measure these pensions by a regular rule, that we should adopt a rule which is just to the taxpayers as well as to the pensioners, and let it be observed in every instance in dealing with all of these cases of a similar class.

Mr. HOUK of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, there are one or two facts to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly that of my friend from Missouri in regard to these Mexican soldiers. In the first place, there is scarcely a Mexican soldier in the country now who is less than 70 years of age, probably not one in a hundred. Another fact to which I wish to call attention is that these Mexican soldiers have been heretofore receiving no pension until the passage of the law allowing them $8 per month. Eight dollars a month is a mere pittance, a mere excuse for a pension.

Now, while I would be in favor of letting every case stand on its own merits, and giving pensions according to the necessities in each individual case, it seems to me that it would take too much time of Congress, while it would be probably difficult to pass a general law to meet all cases. In my judgment, however, such a law should be passed allowing not less than $15 or perhaps $20 a month, and that would not be more than fair in view of the fact that these are all old men and have never received a pension from the Government up to this time. I think these considerations should modify the views of my friend from Missouri in regard to the pending claim.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I will delay the House but a moment. I wish, as one of the Committee on Pensions, to say in regard to the different amounts of pensions reported, that the committee has in every case considered the necessities and condition of the claimant. For instance in one instance, a very old man, bedridden, absolutely helpless, who must be waited upon, cared for by somebody else, would be just as helpless to himself and his family as if he had received a disabling wound; and in such cases the care of the pensioner should be allowed in his pension. That is a question which weighed with the committee, and we have considered all these matters in reporting these bills. I wanted to say this much as a member of that committee.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. What do you allow a Mexican soldier in such a condition as that?

Mr. BOWERS. Well, I think we fix the amount at $20.

Mr. RAY. It ought to be $50.

Mr. PICKLER. Pensioners of the war of the rebellion in such a condition as that get $72 a month.

Mr. BOWERS. I think we have put in none over $20.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why there should be a different rate for the soldier of one war than of another. Every soldier, whether of the Black Hawk war, the Mexican war, or the war of '61, has served his country, and he should be judged upon the basis of that service and his present condition. Now, if you say that $20 a month is the proper rate for the soldier of the Mexican war who is past 70 years of age and is needy, that same rate should be the rate for the soldier of the war of 1861 when he reaches 70 years of age and is also needy; but we do not have such a system at all. I think that they should be placed upon the same basis. If $12 is enough for the soldier of 1861, $12 is enough for the soldier of the Mexican war. If it requires $50 a month for one, it should require $50 for the other.

I am not saying what the limit should be, but as we have made the $12 limit for the ordinary cases of the late war, I would not approve of going above that with the soldiers of the Mexican war unless you have differences of condition. Now you have this condition: an old man, seventy years of age, needing help, who did not come to that condition by wounds received during the war; nor is there any showing that his present condition is the result of army service. It is simply a present condition of need, and he was a soldier. What would you give the soldier of 1861 under the same circumstances? That answers the whole question. And whatever that is, I am ready to vote, I care not what it is.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEREDITH. This morning great indignation was expressed by a great many of my friends, notably the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], that some gentlemen had been charged with attending a horse race. I look around, sir, and I find these gentlemen, with many others, absent this evening. I suppose pool selling is going on to-night. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to notify the gentleman that one of the trio he mentioned is here. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE. I wish to suggest in reply to what has been said here that the Mexican soldiers have been drawing pensions all the time, if there was cause for it.

Mr. HEARD. Or if disabled.

Mr. LANE. Or if disabled, they have had pensions all the time since the Mexican war, and it is only recently that the plan of a service pension has been adopted. It was adopted three or four years ago, I think. Now, it seems to me that we ought to pension all the soldiers who are entitled to pensions, before we commence to raise the pensions of others. I have now in the Pension Office, filed during this session, over a hundred applications for pensions for soldiers who have received no pension at all, many of whom were wounded in the war of 1861, and who are applying for pensions on that account.

Now, why do you want to raise the pensions of some soldiers, when you do not pension other soldiers at all? There are thousands of claims in the Pension Office now, filed on behalf of soldiers who are drawing no pensions at all. Why should we raise the pension of one man who is on the pension roll, and refuse to pension another at all? If we were to give all the soldiers who have now applied for pensions even $12 a month, it would swell the pension list to more than $200,000,000 a year, and I insist that the extravagant rate of $20 a month for a Mexican pensioner is too much, that it will not go around; that it will make it odious; and we had better be fair.

Now, all these gentlemen who are here know that we can not form an estimate of the condition of a man by the papers filed in his case. The papers are fixed up by some shrewd attorney who prepares the affidavits, and you can not tell from those affidavits the condition of the soldier. It depends on the adroitness of the way in which the claim is presented to Congress. These men ought to be ordered before a commission, so as to submit to an examination, if you are going to put it on that ground. As it is now, cases depend on the affidavits of unscrupulous witnesses in many cases. I think $15 a month is a reasonable amount to allow to this man.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. LANE. I call for a division.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend that by fixing the rate at $12 a month; and I would like to say a word or two about it. My purpose is to secure harmony between the rate paid to the pensioners of these different wars. I would be just as willing to make the pension for a soldier of the war of 1861 $15 or $20 a month as to make it for the soldiers of the Mexican war; but as long as the limit for the soldier of 1861 is $12 I do believe that there ought to be some uniformity, and therefore I offer the amendment to make it $12 in this case.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the principle laid down by the gentleman from Iowa is correct. I do not subscribe and can not subscribe to the doctrine some gentlemen advance here, that soldiers ought to be pensioned according to their necessities, unless, as has been said here, you pension them according to the different grades of necessity. In other words, I do not believe in taking individual cases and saying to a soldier of any war, "You must be a pauper before the Government will recognize you by giving you a pension;" and I say further, that there is nothing so repulsive to soldiers of any war as for Congress to hold forth the idea that it only intends to pension them when they are about entering the poorhouse.

I believe in pensions as a matter of justice, and as something due to the soldier from his Government as a matter of right. While there may be some instances where a man is well to do, and does not need a pension, it would seem he ought not to have one on account of being able to take care of himself, there can be no question that the soldier should be recognized as he ought to be. It may be well to have them graded, and then make the law pensioning them general. I believe a pension is not given simply for the good of the individual. I believe it is a lesson of patriotism, to teach our young men and our young women growing up in this country that if another war should come and young men must again defend the flag this is a great and honorable Government and appreciates the worth of its soldiers.

So that I again say that I am opposed to the idea of pensioning a man when he is about entering the poorhouse. That is no accommodation to him. There is no State in the Union that will allow a soldier or any other citizen to go to a poorhouse, or if they do, will take care of him; so that I repeat it is no accommodation to give a pittance of a pension to him when he is about to go into the poorhouse. It should place the matter on a higher ground. The Government owes it to the soldier who has faithfully served and fought for his Government, and on that ground we ought to have a better classification, and possibly we might take into consideration the different necessities in that way; but we ought not to take special cases and compel a soldier to be a pauper before he is allowed a pension.

I agree with the gentleman from Iowa in another thing. I do not believe there ought to be any distinction as to which war the soldier served in. I do not see any reason why a man who is pensioned for services in one war should not receive the same pension as a soldier who served in another war. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE].

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. LANE. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, yeas 45; so the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

FREDERICK MEREDITH,

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5330) for the relief of Frederick Meredith, late a soldier in the Indian war of 1832.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls the name of Frederick Meredith, late a private in the company of Capt. James Hall, in the Indian war of 1832, and that he be paid the sum of $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. NORTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5330) granting a pension to Frederick Meredith, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

Relative to the service of this soldier the War Department, under date of February 19, 1892, reports as follows:

"The muster-out roll of Capt. James Hall's company, Black Hawk war, Illinois Volunteers, dated August 13, 1832, the only record of the organization on file, reports Frederick Meredith, a private, enlisted June 16, 1832, in Hamilton County, to serve three months, 'absent on furlough.'"

"No further record of this soldier has been discovered."

In his petition for relief by special act of Congress, Mr. Meredith states under oath that he served three months in the Indian war and was granted bounty land therefor. He further states that he is now 82 years old, infirm, and without means of support.

Renard Napier and George N. Woodcocke, citizens of Franklin County, Mo., corroborate under oath the claimant's statement relative to age, infirmity, and destitution, and it is also shown that he is a man of temperate and industrious habits.

Your committee respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES M. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R.

1777) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James M. Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the records of the War Department to be so amended as to remove the charge of desertion from the service record of James M. Thompson, late a private in Company F, Twelfth Regiment of Maine Volunteers, and to grant an honorable discharge to the said James M. Thompson, as a private of said company, as of the date of April 10, 1866.

The report (by Mr. CROSBY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1777) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James M. Thompson, have duly considered the same and submit the following report:

This bill directs the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James M. Thompson, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date April 8, 1865. The record shows that he was duly mustered into the service on February 1, 1865, to serve three years, and his company was duly mustered out on April 18, 1866, and said soldier was with his said company or on detached service up to April 10, 1866.

The evidence shows his absence from April 10, 1866, up to April 18, 1866, when he would have been mustered out with his company, to have arisen from sore eyes. Your committee believe he should be relieved from the charge and discharged as of date April 10, 1866.

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Chairman, there is no gentleman on this floor that has a higher respect for the soldier that has honorably served his country than I have. But for the man that entered the service and deserted his comrades in the hour of their danger and his country's peril I have not the most unbounded sympathy. These bills for the removal of the charge of desertion, coming more than a quarter of a century after the war, carry with them the strong suspicion that the alleged soldier is bothered more in his dreams about pensions than about the dishonor of the charge of desertion standing against him.

No bill should pass this House removing the charge of desertion, restoring a man to an honorable service, unless it is clearly and conclusively shown that the claim is a meritorious one and that the soldier has been wronged. We should not forget that the lapse of time greatly favors the beneficiary. A man guilty of crime may, twenty-five years after the event, by the testimony of his chosen friends in an ex parte proceeding, prove his entire innocence. I call attention to these matters in order to show the vigilance we should exercise in passing on these questions, so that injustice be not done to anyone.

I have, at the solicitation of friends, introduced, a few of these bills, feeling that the parties were entitled to an investigation of their cases; but if they are found, on investigation, not to be meritorious, I shall oppose them with the same earnestness that I would oppose a bill introduced by any other member of the House. We owe the duty to the country and every honorably discharged soldier to see that the rolls of our volunteer army are not now dishonored by placing back upon them the name of a single deserter or bounty-jumper, writing him an honorable service by an act of Congress where such soldier by his own acts has written for himself a disgraceful and dishonorable record.

These rolls constitute the history of the greatest volunteer army the world ever saw—the history of over two million men struggling for national life and human liberty. Every soldier, as well as every citizen of the country, is interested in preserving them from dishonor.

There are two bills now pending before the House providing for the permanent preservation of these records which I heartily approve; but I enter my earnest protest against the custodian of these records being selected only from the officers of the regular Army, as provided by those bills. This is a civil position and no one should be excluded from holding the office whom the President might see fit to appoint.

But if the selection is to be made from any particular class let it be from the class of honorably discharged soldiers who helped to make those records. In this view I express the sentiments of the Grand Army of the Republic of the department of Indiana, as set forth in the following resolutions, unanimously adopted at its annual encampment held at Fort Wayne, Ind., April 7, 1892, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill recently introduced in the Senate of the United States, No. 2305, and the similar bill pending in the House of Representatives, No. 6483, providing for the appointment or selection by the President of an officer to be commissioned with the rank of colonel whose duty it shall be to control the work of the division established by the Secretary of War, to be known as the record and pension office of the War Department, meets with the hearty approval and has the earnest indorsement of this encampment.

Resolved, That in the event of the enactment of these bills and their approval by the President, it is the desire of this encampment, and it is hereby expressed in most respectful terms that the officer so to be appointed or selected to be a colonel in the Army, shall be a soldier who served honorably during the late war.

Resolved, That in thus expressing the desire of this encampment in these premises, we deem it proper to call the attention of Congress, as well as the President, to the evident propriety of the appointment or selection of such an officer from the great number of soldiers who served during the late war with honor and distinction and who are abundantly capable of executing the duties that may be required of said officer, under the provisions of the proposed law referred to in the first of these resolutions.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH]

is making a first-class speech, of course, but it does not relate to the question under consideration. The gentleman is talking on a general bill which is not in order to-night. Only private pension bills are in order at these evening sessions, and I think the subject to which the gentleman is talking belongs especially to a day session. However, the speech is a good one, and I am willing to hear it if it is the desire of this body, though I do not think it is in order.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is a proper point of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is discussing the bill in a general way. He will proceed in order.

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I see from the Calendar of the House I hold in my hand that there is seventy-four bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. I presume they are all for the removal of the charge of desertion or pertaining to the records in some manner.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WAUGH. No, sir; not at this point.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is calling attention to the number of bills on the Calendar. I wish to assure him that we shall not be likely to pass any bills, if gentleman insist on taking up the time of the committee with long speeches.

Mr. WAUGH. I hope it is no crime for a member of the minority to speak.

There have also been six bills removing the charge of desertion considered and favorably recommended by the Committee of the Whole, making in all reported eighty. We were informed a few evenings ago by a member of the Committee on Military Affairs that there was hundreds of such cases pending before that committee. This House seems to be a city of refuge for deserters to flee to and secure a remission of their sins against the Government.

There are but fifty-nine invalid pension claims now on the Private Calendar. Only twenty-two have passed the Committee of the Whole with favorable recommendation, making in all eighty-one invalid pension claims reported to the House by the Committee on Invalid Pensions up to this time, just one more case than has been reported to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs for removal of desertion or affecting the status of the military records in some way.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Fifty-first Congress up to this time in its session had favorably reported to the House and was pending on the Calendar for consideration over three hundred private pension claims, and the House of that Congress had passed over two hundred of such bills, notwithstanding the difference in the two Congresses as to this class of legislation.

We should pass no bill removing the charge of desertion where the soldier has made no application to have the charge of desertion against him removed under the general law. Its provisions are broad and would give relief to almost every meritorious case.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think there are any such cases.

Mr. WAUGH. Oh, yes, there are. I understand it is a rule of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and also the rule of the Committee on Pensions, to recommend no bill to this House where the soldier may have an adequate remedy under the general law. The general law, in my judgment, is broad enough to let in almost every meritorious case. Now, I would like to have the Clerk read the sections of the law bearing upon this class of cases, or if the committee prefer, I will include it in my remarks.

[Committee consents.]

[PUBLIC—No. 133.]

SECTION 1. That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, A. D. 1865, having previously served six months or more, and, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge, or that such soldier absented himself from his command, or from hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the line of duty and was prevented from completing his term of enlistment by reason of such wounds, injuries, or disease.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to remove the charge of desertion from the record of any regular or volunteer soldier in the late war upon proper application therefor, and satisfactory proof in the following cases:

First. That such soldier, after such charge of desertion was made, and within a reasonable time thereafter, voluntarily returned to his command and served faithfully to the end of his term of service, or until discharged.

Second. That such soldier absented himself from his command or from hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease, received or contracted in the line of duty, and upon recovery voluntarily returned to his command and served faithfully thereafter, or died from such wounds, injuries, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster out of his command, or expiration of his term of service, or was prevented from so returning by reason of such wounds, injuries, or diseases before such muster out, or expiration of service.

SEC. 3. That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against any regular or volunteer soldier who served in the late war of the rebellion by reason of his having enlisted in any regiment, troop, or company, or in the United States Navy or Marine Corps, without having first received a discharge from the regiment, troop, or company in which he had previously served, shall be removed in all cases wherein it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such reenlistment was not made for the purpose of securing bounty or other gratuity that he would not have been entitled to, had he remained under his original term of enlistment; that the absence from the service did not exceed four months, and that such soldier served faithfully under his reenlistment.

SEC. 4. That whenever it shall appear from the official records in the office of the Adjutant-General, United States Army, that any regular or volunteer soldier of the late war was formally restored to duty from desertion by the commander competent to order his trial for the offense, or, having deserted and being charged with desertion, was, on return to the service, suffered, without such formal restoration, to resume his place in the ranks of his command, serving faithfully thereafter until the expiration of his term, such soldier shall not be deemed to rest under any disability, because of such desertion, in the prosecution of any claim for pension on account of disease contracted, or wounds or injuries received in the line of his duty as a soldier.

SEC. 5. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or, in case of his death, the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive the pay and bounty due to such soldier; Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier, or, in case of his death, to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, any pay, bounty, or allowance for any time during which such soldier was absent from his command without proper authority, nor shall it be so construed as to give any pay, bounty, or allowance to any soldier, his heirs or legal representatives, who served in the Army a period of less than six months.

SEC. 8. That when such charge of desertion is removed under the provisions of this act, the soldier shall be restored to a status of honorable service, his military record shall be corrected as the facts may require, and an honorable discharge shall be issued in those cases where the soldier has received none; and he shall be restored to all his rights as to pension, pay, or allowances as if the charge of desertion had never been made; and in case of the death of said soldier, his widow or other legal heir shall be entitled to the same rights as in case of other deceased honorably discharged soldiers; Provided, That this act shall not be construed to give to any soldier, or his legal representatives or heir, any pay or allowance for any period of time he was absent without leave, and not in the performance of military duty.

SEC. 9. That all applications for relief under this act shall be made to and filed with the Secretary of War within the period of three years from and after July 1, 1889, and all applications not so made and filed within said term of three years shall be forever barred, and shall not be received or considered.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Approved, March 2, 1889.

There is another matter to which I beg leave to call the attention of the committee.

The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, a few evenings ago intimated that in the consideration of pension claims the line ought to be drawn against granting Indiana pensions, as there were more pensioners on the Indiana pension roll than any other State in the North, according to the number of men she furnished the Army, and insinuates that Indiana men were pensioned for political rather than for military services.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman he can inform himself as to the truth of his charges, if he desires the truth. Every Indiana claim, with the proof establishing the same, with the military service in each case, is on file over here in the Pension Office open to his investigation.

Perhaps an unjust insinuation against Indiana soldiers serves the gentleman and his purpose better than the truth. The gentleman has made the charge; now I ask him to give the name of a single Indiana soldier that is unjustly drawing a pension.

If the gentleman thinks Indianians are drawing pensions for political services why does he not have the matter investigated by your committee that is now engaged in investigating the Pension Office?

Mr. DOKERY. It would take a considerable time, however, to make such an investigation.

Mr. WAUGH. No time is too long to be devoted to investigation if gentleman really wish to get at the truth.

Why did not your Democratic Administration under Black make an investigation if there is anything crooked in Indiana pension matters. Was it because you were afraid, if there was crookedness, it would smell too strongly of Democratic flavor? I resent the insinuation of the gentleman that Indiana soldiers are being pensioned for political services as an insult to every Indiana soldier and to every citizen of the State, and denounce it as false and unjust. Indiana soldiers established their heroism and bravery upon three hundred and eight battlefields. They fought on the first battlefield of the war, Phillipi, West Virginia, and on the last, Palmetto Ranch, in Texas.

I want to say, here and now, in my place on this floor, that I would rather be the possessor of the pension certificate issued to the humblest of all Indiana soldiers than to be the possessor of the highest commission issued in the armies of treason and rebellion against my country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana how it is (as he has failed to explain that point) that of 190,000 soldiers who enlisted in the late war from Indiana 55,000 are on the pension rolls, while from the adjoining State of Illinois, which furnished 265,000 soldiers, there are only 49,000 on the pension rolls. That is the question I asked the other night, and I asked it in good faith. I wanted the country to know that in the State of Indiana there was one pensioner for about every three and a half of her enlisted men, while in the State of Illinois there was only about one to every six enlisted men. If the gentleman can explain to the House and the country that fact I shall be glad to hear him do it. As to the "resentment" which he gets up here two weeks after I have made my speech, it seems to me that it has been a little slow in rising. However, better late than never; and now, if he will answer my question, we will debate the subject a little further.

Mr. WAUGH. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I do not concede that the number of men on the Indiana pension roll proves in any sense the number of Indians on the pension roll. I presume the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] got the information that he quoted the other evening from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions of June 30, 1891. That gave the number of men paid at the Indiana pension office, but not the number of Indians pensioned. There are thousands of pensioners on the Indiana pension rolls that are not Indiana soldiers. The Indiana pension office is one of the central offices between the East and the West, and I presume that on account of geographical location more soldiers have been in Indiana since the war or have passed across its borders than any other State in the Union. I have a constituent in my district who is now in this Hall whose name is upon the pension roll here in Washington.

Mr. MEREDITH. I want to ask this gallant soldier, whom the Directory does not disclose was in the Army—

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes it does. That is a mistake.

Mr. MEREDITH. It was so stated just now. I want to ask him if it was fair, if it was chivalrous, and if it was brave in closing that speech, so elegantly prepared and so magnificently delivered, to make a little mean fling at this side of the House when we are voting pensions to your people? I want to ask the gentleman in common fairness if it is proper, just, or chivalrous? I have no doubt he was in the Army from the manner in which he made his speech and his warlike appearances upon the floor to-night. I suspect that he was at Bull Run, and I have no doubt he made a bully run upon that occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. WAUGH. I presume Bull Run is the gentleman's favorite battle. I was in the service on the successful side in successful battles. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana how it is (as he has failed to explain that point) that of 190,000 soldiers who enlisted in the late war from Indiana 55,000 are on the pension rolls, while from the adjoining State of Illinois, which furnished 265,000 soldiers, there are only 49,000 on the pension rolls. That is the question I asked the other night, and I asked it in good faith. I wanted the country to know that in the State of Indiana there was one pensioner for about every three and a half of her enlisted men, while in the State of Illinois there was only about one to every six enlisted men. If the gentleman can explain to the House and the country that fact I shall be glad to hear him do it. As to the "resentment" which he gets up here two weeks after I have made my speech, it seems to me that it has been a little slow in rising. However, better late than never; and now, if he will answer my question, we will debate the subject a little further.

Mr. WAUGH. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I do not conceive that the number of men on the Indiana pension roll proves in any sense the number of Indians on the pension roll. I presume the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] got the information that he quoted the other evening from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions of June 30, 1891. That gave the number of men paid at the Indiana pension office, but not the number of Indians pensioned. The Indiana pension office is one of the central offices between the East and the West, and I presume that on account of geographical location more soldiers have been in Indiana since the war or have passed across its borders than in any other State in the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman assume that Indiana is any more central than Illinois?

Mr. WAUGH. There is a gentleman in my district who is a pensioner—

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] will not consume the time of the committee, but will let us proceed with our business. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] allow me to ask him a question? Why did he not compare Indiana with Ohio?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. No, sir; you compared Ohio with New Jersey.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I mentioned all the States; and the comparison holds good as to all.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. The State of Ohio has nearly twenty thousand more pensioners than Indiana—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; and she furnished more soldiers to the war.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. And Ohio can not be called by any manner of means a doubtful State politically at Presidential elections.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman has read my remarks, he must have seen that I made the comparison as to Ohio; and I assume that in nearly every election since the war Ohio has been Democratic. She has had a Democratic governor about half the time, and has had a Democratic Senator of the United States ever since the war.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman from Illinois will admit that she probably will go Democratic this fall. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. WAUGH. I hope I may be permitted—

Mr. POWERS. I rise to a point of order. The Committee of the Whole is engaged in considering the bill which was read by the Clerk. None of the talk to which we have listened for the last three-quarters of an hour has had anything to do with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair will state that the rules of the House require that debate be addressed to the subject under consideration, and the rules of the House obtain in Committee of the Whole so far as applicable. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed under the rules.

Mr. POWERS. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled upon the point. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When I am through answering my friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] I have very little more to say.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I shall say but a few words, for I do not wish to consume the time of the committee and prevent the consideration of these pension cases. The statement of the gentleman from Tennessee was, in my judgment, exceedingly unfair. No one can determine anything from such a statement as that made by him. Take almost any one of the Western States, and they have more pensioners in proportion to the number of the soldiers who served than the Eastern States, because the course of emigration has been to the West.

When in Iowa a few years ago I had occasion to notice that in the county of Linn, in that State, there were about as many soldiers residing in that county who had served in Illinois regiments as there were who had served in Iowa regiments. And the same, I think, was true in Marshall County. I had brothers residing in those counties and happened to be there at the time when an assessment of those counties had just been made and they were required to return the names of all soldiers, with the regiments in which they served. Kansas is full of pensioners; so is Nebraska—

Mr. WAUGH. And Texas.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. And there are more soldiers in Kansas and Nebraska who served in Illinois regiments, in Indiana regiments, in Ohio regiments, and regiments of other States than there are soldiers who served in regiments belonging to those States, and so it is in many Western States.

The point I make is, that there are 76,814 soldiers—I believe the gentleman stated that to be the number—in Ohio, which at a Presidential election has never been regarded as doubtful for the last quarter of a century.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why does not the gentleman admit that a State which voted in 1876, between Tilden and Hayes, over 600,000 votes, when Hayes only carried it by 6,000 majority, is a doubtful State?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Not a doubtful State by any means.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And when it has had a Democrat in the United States Senate ever since the war and a Democratic governor half the time?

Mr. STORER. Oh, no; not half the time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, nearly half the time. I do not speak with entire accuracy as to dates now, but in a general way. Not with the same accuracy I employed in discussing this pension matter. I insist when I addressed the committee two weeks ago to-night I had the figures entirely accurate. They were taken from the report of the Commissioner.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I do not question the fact that the gentleman was accurate in his figures. The only question is as to the application he makes of them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I had no intention, Mr. Chairman, of alluding to this matter again to-night; but since it has been alluded to, I insist that the gentleman from Illinois, who is a clear-headed and fair-minded man, it seems to me will not assert that the conclusions I have reached are not warranted by the facts, or that the political conditions in Indiana has had nothing to do with enlarging the pension roll. I insist the gentleman will hardly undertake to say that that has had nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Was that not true under Commissioner Black as well?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Undoubtedly. I am not undertaking to say that Mr. Black restricted the roll in any respect. I am only speaking of the facts that exist without reference to who may have been the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I do not charge that he did by any means.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not care to debate this subject much further, but the point I wish to emphasize is this: That Indiana has been a close State politically, and her pension roll is therefore larger in proportion to the number of enlisted men which the State sent into the Army than any State in the Union to-day. No gentleman who is aware of the facts will challenge that statement.

Now, I say that that State is no more centrally located than Illinois or Ohio, and that therefore the reason given why there happens to be a larger pension roll in the State has no foundation in fact. Next to Indiana, Ohio has a pension roll which is larger and far larger than any other State in proportion to the number of soldiers furnished to the war. I ask, therefore, if it might not be true that these facts are to be accounted for by reason of the other fact that these two States were recognized as close political States, particularly Indiana.

If any gentleman can answer that question to my satisfaction I would like to hear it here and now. But I do not accept the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, who raised this controversy to-night, because I have very little respect, if I may be permitted to say so under the rules, for the manner in which this statement was offered by way of a solution of that question. But if my friend from Illinois can offer any satisfactory explanation I shall be very glad to hear it. I say that there is one in three and a fraction from Indiana of enlisted men on the pension roll, if we accept the number as given by the Pension Office; in Ohio it is one in four and a little fraction.

Mr. WAUGH. And two and a fraction in Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. While if you take New York it is one in seven, and Pennsylvania one in six and a fraction. Now, if any man can offer any further explanation than that the political complexion and condition of these States is the governing factor in making the allowance of pensions, I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana has embraced Kansas in his statement. Kansas is not a doubtful State, while Indiana is. But members of the Grand Army have counted up this thing very carefully, and they tell me that there are two and a half times as many pensioners in proportion to old soldiers in Indiana as in Kansas; and it appears to me that the gentleman from Tennessee is pretty nearly right in his assertion. The People's party there have made Kansas a doubtful State, and the general impression now is that we get pensions granted twice as easily as ever before. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand the gentleman, he says it is his honest opinion that Mr. Black—

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). Made a different rule for the allowance of pensions to Indiana soldiers to what he did in other States. Is not that what the gentleman asserted in answer to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not say that, and I will leave it to the RECORD. The gentleman asked if I charged that, and I said I did not exonerate Commissioner Black or inculpate Commissioner Raum. I simply called attention to the facts. I do not know that the pension roll was increased out of proportion under Mr. Black. I do not undertake to say when these names got on the roll. I have expressed no opinion on that subject.

Mr. BARTINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTINE. I understand the gentleman to suggest that the reason why there are so many more pensioners relatively in some States than others is that some States are closer politically than others.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I said that; yes.

Mr. BARTINE. I also understood the gentleman to say that the proportion in Pennsylvania is one to six.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Six and a fraction.

Mr. BARTINE. While the proportion in New York is one to seven?

Mr. RICHARDSON. About that.

Mr. BARTINE. New York had always been a very close State and Pennsylvania not. How does the gentleman reconcile that?

Mr. RICHARDSON. New York has never been as close a State politically as Indiana—as doubtful.

Mr. BARTINE. I am comparing Pennsylvania with New York, not with Indiana.

Mr. RICHARDSON. New York has gone Democratic very generally.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. It voted for Harrison and it voted for Grant.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There may be some exceptions which the gentleman can call attention to, but the difference between six and a fraction and seven is very slight. I do not undertake to carry the fractions in my mind now, but I did set them out substantially in the remarks which I had the honor to make two weeks ago to-night.

Mr. BARTINE. I simply called attention to the fact because Pennsylvania has been regarded as a banner Republican State while New York has been regarded as a doubtful State.

Mr. HULL. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULL. The bill before the committee is not even a pension bill. It is a bill to remove a charge of desertion; and I ask the Chair to rule upon the point whether when a bill to remove a charge of desertion is before the committee the committee can wander off on questions entirely foreign to the bill before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated the rule, and again requests gentlemen to proceed under the rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the merits of the bill under discussion, but I want to say a single word to the gentleman who read that speech of elegant diction, that speech which was so elaborately prepared. I want to ask this gallant soldier, whom the Directory does not disclose was in the Army—

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes it does. That is a mistake.

Mr. MEREDITH. It was so stated just now. I want to ask him if it was fair, if it was chivalrous, and if it was brave in closing that speech, so elegantly prepared and so magnificently delivered, to make a little mean fling at this side of the House when we are voting pensions to your people? I want to ask the gentleman in common fairness if it is proper, just, or chivalrous? I have no doubt he was in the Army from the manner in which he made his speech, and his warlike appearance upon the floor to-night. I suspect that he was at Bull Run, and I have no doubt he made a bully run upon that occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. WAUGH. I presume Bull Run is the gentleman's favorite battle. I was on the successful side in successful battles.

Mr. MEREDITH. Well, now, let me say to you, my friend, that the war has been over for nearly thirty years—

Mr. WAUGH. Certainly.

Mr. MEREDITH. And that brave men of both armies have assembled here—

Mr. WAUGH. Certainly.

Mr. MEREDITH. And this is the first time that I have heard so mean, so low, so contemptible a fling made at this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WAUGH. To what part of the speech does the gentleman refer?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He referred to the last sentence in your speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appeals to the gentlemen to proceed under the rule, which provides that discussion shall be limited to the subject before the committee.

Mr. CROSBY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CROSBY. I rise to discuss this bill. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it is about time something was said about this bill. I want to say this is a bill to remove a charge of desertion standing against James M. Thompson. Thompson went into the Army and served until April 10, 1866, when he went home because of a serious affection of his eyes, which affection it was thought would result in total blindness. His regiment was discharged in eight days after that time, and it was merely a technical desertion at the worst.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say what I think is not generally known by those who do not come here night after night, and those who are not familiar with the proceedings of this House. The people of the country should know where the opposition comes from to these pension bills; and they should also know that the time of this House is taken up by the Republican members in discussion, in the making of general speeches, when the Democrats are here ready to pass any reasonable and proper pension bill that may be presented. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is the second time, Mr. Chairman, in three nights that gentlemen have gotten upon the floor and delayed the proceedings here by discussions lasting from hour to hour; and I submit that it comes with bad grace from a Republican from Indiana, a State where it is supposed everybody is the friend of the soldier. It is unfair for him to stand up here and consume the time of this House for an hour or more that might be used in passing pension bills, and it does not come with good grace, therefore, for gentlemen on the other side to delay this sort of legislation. The delay, nine times out of ten, comes from the Republican side.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no.

Mr. CROSBY. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is the fact, and I desire that the country should understand it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PICKLER. You are clear off.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. HULL. I am in favor of the bill, Mr. Chairman, but there is an amendment that I think should be attached to this and all other bills of this character, and that is to provide that no pay or emoluments shall become due by virtue of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his amendment.

Mr. HULL. Add to the bill: Provided that no pay or emoluments shall become due by virtue of this act. The Committee on Military Affairs desire to add such an amendment to these bills. It is simply an oversight that it has been reported without such a provision, as that committee think it ought to be placed on all bills of this character.

Mr. CROSBY. I accept the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I just want to say a word on that amendment. It seems to me that if any soldier is entitled to have his record clear, he is entitled to have every advantage that comes from making that record clear; and it seems to me a mere farce to wipe out a stain upon a soldier's record and then deprive him of the rights that would follow from having that stain removed.

If a soldier is worthy of having his record cleared he is worthy of every emolument and every result that will follow, and you do not remove stain if you leave him without that right.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That no pay or emoluments shall become due by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. LANE. That amounts to nothing, and if you put this amendment upon this bill he can still get a pension.

Mr. PICKLER. But suppose there was some back pay, this would cut it off.

Mr. LANE. It amounts to nothing.

Mr. HULL. It is not the object of the Committee on Military Affairs to deprive any man of a pension. I do not believe a man ought to have such a disability removed if he is unworthy under the pension laws to claim a pension if otherwise entitled to one.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division there were—ayes 34, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HARMON H. McELVEY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to make a motion, which I think is not entirely in order, but which I think will be allowed, if I can be given one minute to make a statement. A short time ago the committee ordered a bill to be reported with a favorable recommendation in the case of Harmon H. McElvey (348 on the Calendar) where the conditions were exactly the same as in the bill which we passed at $20 a month. We passed the bill I allude to at $8 a month. There was the same condition of absolute destitution and decrepit old age, and I would like to make a motion to reconsider the motion by which that bill was reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to reconsider is not in order in Committee of the Whole; but the Clerk will report the bill, and then the gentleman can submit his request for unanimous consent. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5342) granting a pension to Harmony H. McElvey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to amend the bill by striking out "eight," and inserting "twenty."

Mr. BUTLER. To make it correspond with the bill that was passed at $20.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LANE. I object.

XXIII—238

Mr. BUTLER. I wanted to make the pension the same as another of the same kind.

ABRAM GROAT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 2430) for the relief of Abram Groat.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the records of the War Department to be so amended as to remove the charge of desertion from the service record of Abram Groat, late of Company K, Forty-fourth Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of date of March 1, 1865.

The report (by Mr. CROSBY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2430) for the relief of Abram Groat, submit the following report:

Abram Groat, late of Company K, Forty-fourth Regiment New York Infantry, was tried by general court-martial at Culpeper, Va., in October, 1863, and convicted of desertion. No sentence was imposed and he was restored to duty and participated in many battles till July 10, 1864, when while on picket duty he was relieved and was informed that the proceedings of the court, which had been mislaid, had been found and that he was sentenced. He was imprisoned at Fort Jefferson, Dry Tortugas, Fla., and remained there till March, 1865, when he was pardoned by President Lincoln, being granted pay and allowances.

In view of his satisfactory services after the trial and the fact that a pardon was granted, your committee deem it but an act of justice to remove the record of desertion and to grant him an honorable discharge. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, if this soldier was pardoned by the President, according to my understanding of the matter he would be completely restored to his rights without any necessity for a special bill. He got the pay and allowance which had accrued prior to the time when he was pardoned. I would like to hear from some member of the committee, or some gentleman who knows about the matter, as to the difference between the effect of a special bill of this kind and the effect of a pardon by the President.

Another point. The committee has been in the habit of limiting these bills so as to prevent the party relieved from receiving any pay, allowance, or emolument which might have accrued, and I suggest that this bill should be amended in that way.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROSBY] has charge this bill and I do not see him in his seat at this moment, but my understanding is that the report from the War Department shows that this man had all his pay up to the date of his discharge.

Mr. KILGORE. Suppose that he were to apply for a pension, could not he claim back pay between 1865 and the present date?

Mr. HULL. If we should grant him an honorable discharge without specifying the date at which it shall issue he could draw pay all the way up.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Texas as to whether the effect of the President's pardon would be to relieve the soldier of his disability, I will say that I do not think it would. It would simply relieve him from the penalty, but it would not remove the charge of desertion.

Mr. KILGORE. Generally the effect of a pardon is to restore the man to the position which he occupied before the offense was committed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That depends upon the terms of the pardon.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no pay or emolument shall become due by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PATRICK HYLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 945) for the relief of Patrick Hyland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Patrick Hyland, enlisted as a private September 9, 1861, in Company B, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, at Philadelphia, Pa., and grant him an honorable discharge under date of May 1, 1864.

The report (by Mr. PATTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 945) for the relief of Patrick Hyland, having considered the same, respectfully report:

Patrick Hyland enlisted September 9, 1861, in Company B, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, and served faithfully until January, 1864, when he reenlisted in same organization as a veteran. He went home on veteran furlough in April, 1864, and on the expiration of his leave of absence he was sick in bed with typhoid fever. As soon as he was able to travel he started to rejoin his regiment; while on his way was again taken sick and returned to his home, and there remained sick and unable for duty until the close of the war. His failure to return was unavoidable and from no fault of his.

Your committee submit as a part of their report the soldier's record as given from records of the War Department, and the affidavits of Thomas Fagan, Margaret Soden, and said Patrick Hyland, and recommend that the bill do pass.

Case of Patrick Hyland, late private of Company B, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers.

RECORD AND PENSION DIVISION, July 30, 1890.

Patrick Hyland (also borne as "Heland"), private Company B, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, was enrolled at Philadelphia, Pa., on September 9, 1861, to serve three years; reenlisted on January 1, 1864, as a veteran volunteer, and is reported present on roll of company for January and February, 1864; roll for March and April, 1864, shows him absent with leave on veteran furlough; roll for May and June, 1864 (last roll of the company upon which his name is borne), reports him absent, deserted about May 1, 1864. He did not thereafter return to military control, although his command was retained in service until July 14, 1865.

The Hon. Henry H. Bingham, M. C., was informed by the Department, in a letter dated July 14, 1888, in which the soldier's record was quoted, that if, as is inferred from the soldier's letter herewith returned, he was prevented from returning and completing his term of enlistment by reason of physical disability, it will be necessary for him to establish that fact by the testimony of his attending physician or other reliable parties, and also that such disability was contracted in the line of his duty, before he can become entitled to a discharge certificate from his veteran enlistment.

The testimony required has not been furnished, and in its absence the case is not embraced within the provisions of any law governing the subject of desertions.

Respectfully submitted.

Captain and Assistant Surgeon, United States Army,

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

GENERAL AFFIDAVIT.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Philadelphia, ss:

In the matter of Patrick Hyland, Company B, Sixty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

On this 13th day of March, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a magistrate in and for said county and State, Thomas Fagan, aged 47 years, a resident of the city of Philadelphia, county of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, whose post-office address is 4422 Parrish street, and who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says, in relation to the aforesaid case, as follows:

I served in Company B, Sixty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was personally acquainted with Patrick Hyland, of the same company and regiment. I reenlisted at the same time that Patrick Hyland did, and came home with the regiment at the same time, and am personally knowing of the fact that when the regiment's veteran furlough expired and was returning to the front that the said Patrick Hyland was laid up sick from typhoid fever, and was confined to his residence and under the care of physician.

Between the time the regiment went back on its veteran furlough, January 1864, and October, 1864, I saw a letter that was received by Private James Tag, of the same company, and in said letter it stated that Patrick Hyland was still very sick and not expected to live.

In the battle of October, 1864, I was wounded and came home, and when I came home I saw the said Patrick Hyland and he was only a shadow of his former self; he was just recovering from his sickness, was just able to walk about, and in conversation he informed me that he had been sick ever since the regiment left.

I was home from October to the latter part of January, 1865, and during this time I saw him quite frequently and know he was not at any time fit to perform any military duty, he being still very weak.

I was discharged in July, 1865, and saw him again and he was a physical wreck, and had not done any work, neither was fit to do any work or to perform military duty.

He was always regarded by the officers as being homesick; he was not looked upon as a deserter; had they suspected him of such he could have easily been arrested, as it was known to us all where he was.

I further declare that I have no interest in said case, and am not concerned in its prosecution.

THOMAS FAGAN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution.

Witness my hand and official seal this 13th day of March, 1890.

GENERAL AFFIDAVIT.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Philadelphia, ss:

In the matter of Patrick Hyland, late Company B, Sixty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

On this 12th day of March, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a magistrate in and for aforesaid county and State, Margaret Soden, aged 52 years, a resident of the city of Philadelphia, county of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, whose post-office address is 2419 Factory street, and who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says in relation to the aforesaid case as follows:

I am knowing of the following facts: My husband, James Tag, was a member of Company B, Sixty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and I resided within one square from the residence of Patrick Hyland, the claimant, and know that while he was home on a veteran furlough that he was taken very sick with the typhoid fever and was confined to his residence, and when their time of furlough was expired and they were going back to the Army, then the said Patrick Hyland was sick in bed with the typhoid fever and was under the care of a doctor, William Harper, and to my own personal knowledge he, the said Patrick Hyland, was mentally distressed because he could not return with the regiment, and to relieve his fears I personally went to the colonel and reported his sickness and the severity of the same, and the colonel requested that he follow the regiment as soon as he was able.

I nursed him in his sickness and know he was delirious and out of his mind and hovered between life and death for a month or two, and he left his room earlier than he should have done and the result was he had a relapse and then was sick for about three months, and as soon as he was able to move about again he started for to join his regiment. He was very weak and could scarcely walk, and when he got as far as Washington he had to come back again, and he wanted to go to the hospital at Twenty-fifth and South streets, but his father would not allow it and he was brought home again and was under the charge again of Dr. Hopper. Then when he did get well of the fever he was taken sick with a chronic diarrhea and he had his blotches to break out all over his body and he continued in this condition until long after the war was over. He was not able to do any work for fully two years after the close of the war.

I am confident he was at no time in a condition fit to do or perform military duty from the time he came home on his veteran furlough in 1864 until fully a year after the war was over. I further declare that I have no interest in said case and am not concerned in its prosecution.

MRS. MARGARET SODEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution.

ISRAEL W. DURHAM,

Magistrate Court No. 6.

APPLICATION FOR REMOVAL OF CHARGE OF DESERTION.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Philadelphia, ss:

On this — day of March, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a magistrate in and for the county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, Patrick Hyland, now a resident of Philadelphia, county of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, who, being duly sworn, declares that he is the identical person who served under the name of Patrick Hyland, in Company B, in the Sixty-seventh Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers; that he was enlisted in said company and regiment on or about the 9th day of September, 1861, at Philadelphia, in the county of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, by Capt. Thos. Conner, mustered into service on or about the 9th day of September, 1861, at Philadelphia, in the county of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania; that he served faithfully until on or about the 1st day of February, 1864, when, without any intention of deserting, he left the regiment under the following circumstances, viz:

Whilst he was home on the veteran furlough he was taken sick with typhoid fever and was unable to return with his regiment at the expiration of said furlough, and his anxiety to go back was so great that in enfeebled condition he left his sick room and followed the regiment as far as Washington, D. C., and whilst en route thereto the fever increased and to such an extent that when he reached Washington he was unable to proceed any further, and by the advice of officers and men who were strangers to him and who were awaiting transportation at the depot in Washington, all of whom advised him to return home again and to go to some hospital in his native city, which the claimant done, and as soon as he arrived in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., he immediately went to the South street United States general hospital, which was only about one square from his residence. He was admitted to the said hospital, but was only there a short time, as his father called at said hospital and obtained the consent of the surgeon in charge to take the claimant to his residence for treatment; this request the surgeon very readily complied with, and stated he was glad to do so, as the hospital was so well filled with sick and wounded at that time.

The claimant continued very sick with the typhoid fever for about several (three) months, &c., just as he was recovering from the first attack he was taken with a relapse and was then about five weeks in a delirious condition. Furthermore, whilst suffering from the typhoid fever the chronic diarrhea came on him, and so severe in character as to prostrate him, and from the effects of the typhoid fever and chronic diarrhea he was never at any time sufficiently recovered to perform military duty, and said debilitated condition continued on him from February, 1864, to May, 1865, and for some time subsequent thereto, and as his absence from his command was not due to nor the fault of the claimant in any manner, therefore he files this declaration, which is made for the purpose of securing a removal of the charge of desertion, and he hereby appoints, with full power of substitution and revocation, James B. O'Neill, 118 South Sixth street, of Philadelphia, Pa., his attorney to present his application and to receive and accept for the discharge that may be issued thereon, and to do any and all acts necessary to effect the purpose of his said appointment. His post-office address is 410 South Twenty-sixth street, Philadelphia, Pa.

PATRICK HYLAND.

Also, personally appeared before me Charles Seger, now a resident of the city of Philadelphia, in the county of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, and Daniel Devenny, is now a resident of the city of Philadelphia, in the county of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, to me well known as creditable persons, who, being sworn, declare that they have been for — acquainted with the above-named applicant; that they know him to be the person he represents himself to be; that they have every reason to believe that the foregoing affidavit by him subscribed is correct and true, and they have no interest in this claim.

CHARLES SEGAR.

DANIEL DEVENNY.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Philadelphia, ss:

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, including the words erased and the words — added, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution; and that said affiant is personally known to me, and that he is a creditable person.

ISRAEL W. DURHAM,

Magistrate Court No. 6.

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding a provision that no pay allowance or pension shall result from the passage of this bill. This report shows that this soldier four years ago, through his Representative in Congress, was notified that if he would submit to the War Department the affidavit of his physician showing his sickness at the time claimed, and that, by reason of such sickness, he was unable to return to the service his case would be heard and adjudicated. The soldier did nothing of the kind, and he now submits to this House not the affidavit called for by the Department, but testimony of witnesses that would not be received upon a medical question in any court of justice in the land, to wit, the testimony of his neighbors, who are called to prove that he had typhus fever, diarrhea, etc.

All this he undertakes to establish by the opinion of his neighbors, nonexperts. Remember, too, that this absence of the soldier was for over a year. Now, it occurs to me that we do him ample justice when we remove the charge of desertion with a proviso that no pay allowance or pension shall become due by reason of the passage of this act.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WAUGH, and it was rejected—ayes 21, noes 35.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear the latter part of that bill read again.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by adding: Provided, That no pay or emoluments shall become due by virtue of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. Do I understand the gentleman [Mr. WAUGH] to assert that under the general law as it exists this charge of desertion could be removed from this soldier?

Mr. WAUGH. As to this case I will not say, but I will say this, that in almost every imaginable case that can possibly come within the domain of justice or merit the charge can be removed upon proper application to the Secretary of War, under the act to which I referred in my remarks this evening. That act was passed, approved in March, 1889, and it provides that applications may be made under it up to the 1st day of July, 1892.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The time has not expired?

Mr. WAUGH. It has not; but what I say is, that in no case should the charge of desertion be removed from a soldier's record until he has availed himself of the provisions of the general law so far as they may apply to his case.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I agree entirely with that statement. I think the House ought to stay proceedings in matters of this kind until we are informed in each particular case whether there are special circumstances which prevent the operation of the general law. We are entering upon special legislation in hundreds of cases where the relief sought could be had under the general law.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The bill which was under consideration a few moments ago has been passed; and I raise the point of order that the discussion of the question involved in that bill is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not well taken. Only the amendment was agreed to. The question is now, whether the bill as amended shall be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House. The gentleman from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, my attention has just been called to the possibility of removing these charges of desertion under the general law as it exists. I have not heretofore been very familiar with these pension laws; but if that statement be true, it emphasizes the objection that I have made here from time to time to the passage of special bills to accomplish that which can be done under the general law. Special legislation is always objectionable, and should never be indulged in unless there is some necessity for it. That necessity never exists when the object can be attained under general law.

Now, the question I raise here is—and until this question is answered the House ought not to proceed to the passage of this bill or any like it—whether the evidence shows a state of facts which prevents the applicant from taking advantage of the general law, and if so, whether the facts are of such a character as ought to persuade the House to legislate specially. This question ought to be propounded in every one of these cases; and until it is answered satisfactorily we ought not to proceed in this class of special legislation.

I am perfectly free to admit that there are cases where it is right to have special legislation; there are cases in which general rules can not be made to apply, and which, notwithstanding, are meritorious cases and ought to receive the attention of the House. But, inasmuch as special legislation is never to be favored, wherever it is invoked the strict rule ought to apply that the evidence should show the necessity for special legislation.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. PATTON] says that he can explain the case, and I hope he will. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Chairman, I prepared this report, and in order to do so I made a thorough investigation of the matter. In this case an application for relief was made to the War Department, but the case failed to come under the general law, and relief could not be obtained in that way.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Was that failure because of the want of the necessary proof, or because the principles applying in this case were different from those applying in cases under the general law?

Mr. PATTON. The trouble was this: The soldier was a minor; he was really kept from returning to the Army by his father. My impression is—perhaps it is best the report should be referred to in order to verify this impression—that the soldier was relieved from the penalty of desertion by the President.

I will say that this bill provides nothing in the way of relief except simply to enable this man to obtain a position under the Government. He is already drawing a pension of $12 a month, and is not entitled to more; it is not likely that he could get more if he should try. But the charge against him as it stands prevents him from getting a position under the Government; and it is with a view to that matter that this bill be presented.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. How could he get a pension while he was resting under the charge of desertion?

Mr. PATTON. I know that he is getting a pension—

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The suggestion is made to me that the reason he is getting a pension may be that he lives in Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTON. No, sir; he does not live in Indiana and never did; but he is drawing a pension of $12 a month, as the report shows.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Under a special act?

Mr. PATTON. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How was it possible for him to obtain a pension when his military record was not correct?

Mr. PATTON. He is drawing a pension. As I understand, his final discharge from the Army was regular; but having been kept home by his father he had been charged with desertion; afterward, when he returned to the service, he was relieved of the penalty by the action of the President, so that on finally leaving the Army he was honorably discharged. Under the law he was entitled to a pension and received it; but on account of this old charge of desertion he is not now allowed to occupy a position in one of the Departments under the Government.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. If my friend is familiar with the history of this case, I would like to know how it is that a man is esteemed worthy to receive a pension regularly from the Government, and yet can not secure a little office under it?

Mr. PATTON. I do not think it is right that this should be so; I do not approve of it at all, but such is the fact.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, that is not the law; and I do not understand how he obtained this pension.

Mr. PATTON. You will have to apply to Commissioner Raum for information about that.

Mr. SIMPSON. He wants this bill now to make it right?

Mr. PATTON. No, sir; his pension is right now.

Mr. SIMPSON. He wants the bill to make everything right.

Mr. PATTON. He wants to obtain a position in one of the Departments; and this charge of desertion stands in his way. He can not obtain the position until the charge is removed. In order that the matter may be fully understood, I would like to have the report read.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have this report in full.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is too long.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, if it is too long to read the report we will lay the bill aside, but not with a favorable recommendation, until we can have time to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the reading of the report will probably consume the entire remainder of the evening session.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit whether we are to legislate here upon the idea that we can not examine the testimony because it will take too much time? I think that emphasizes the viciousness of the system of special legislation anyhow.

Mr. HEARD. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that the report is short.

Mr. PATTON. Very short.

Mr. LANE. But it does not state the facts.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is this case from a doubtful political State?

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that subdivision 2 of the general law, to which reference has already been made, which was passed on the 3d of March, 1889, allows applications for relief under it up to July, 1892, so that the time has not yet expired.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I think we had better understand this case a little more fully.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Chairman, owing to the shortness of the time before the session must close to-night, and the fact that some members want to look at the evidence a little more closely in this case, I am willing that it shall go over without prejudice to another evening, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ANNA MORGAN BURNS.

Mr. DUNGAN. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my request for unanimous consent to take up and consider the bill (H. R. 7146) to pension Anna Morgan Burns.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place the name of Anna Morgan Burns, the invalid daughter of the late Capt. James Burns, of the Fifth United States Cavalry, upon the pension rolls, and pay her a pension at the rate of — dollars per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. PEARSON) is as follows:

The committee have considered the bill (H. R. 7146) granting a pension to Anna M. Burns, dependent daughter of Capt. James Burns, and submit the following report:

James Burns served as second lieutenant, first lieutenant, and captain Fifth United States Cavalry, from August 9, 1865, until August 15, 1874, when he died in the service. His widow was pensioned until her death, February 9, 1881, and two children of the soldier, Anna M. and George C., were subsequently pensioned until arriving at the age of 16 years, which in the case of George C., the younger, was July 8, 1890, since which date no pension has been paid. Anna Morgan Burns, the daughter of the deceased soldier, was born September 24, 1871, and is 30 years of age. It is shown in evidence that she is a helpless invalid from consumption.

Dr. S. S. Moffatt, of Washington, D. C., testifies that she is suffering from phthisis pulmonalis and is helpless.

Mary H. Morse testifies that the petitioner is unable to leave the house, and is helpless so far as the ordinary affairs of life are concerned; that she needs constant attention and medicine and food such as her aged grandfather, who maintains her, is not able to furnish her, and that her recovery is impossible.

Dr. H. E. Leach testifies that he has been the medical adviser of the petitioner since 1881; that she is suffering from chronic pharyngitis and phthisis of hereditary origin as well as other troubles; and that she is perfectly helpless and has been for some time.

There is also on file a statement to the effect that the grandfather, Mr. Morgan, discharging last year leaving the soldier's two children without a cent of money, and that the son has a small position in the District assessor's office, being paid by the day; that both son and daughter have recently been ill with scarlet fever, and that his pay stopped during his illness, and they were then dependent on friends. This statement is made in a letter from M. B. Morse, an employe of the Department of Justice.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill after amending it by inserting the word "twelve" before the word "dollars" in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNGAN. The first question, I suppose, is on the amendment.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID REED.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 7123) granting an increase of pension to David Reed, and to put it upon its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase to the sum of $24 per month the pension of David Reed, late of Company I, Third Regiment Missouri Mounted Volunteers, in the war with Mexico, said pension to be in lieu of the amount now drawn by him under certificate numbered 2698.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out $24 per month and insert $30 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN. I will not object to the consideration of this bill, but I do think that this committee will justify me hereafter in insisting on the regular order. It is simply taking up these bills out of their order, and putting others back which properly have precedence on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report by (Mr. WILSON of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7123) granting an increase of pension to David Reed, have considered the same and report:

The claimant, who is now about 70 years old, was a private in Company I, Third Missouri Mounted Volunteers, and served from May 28, 1847, to October 30, 1848, in the war with Mexico. He is now receiving the pension of $8 per month provided by law for the survivors of said war.

Your committee had before them a petition signed by ninety-three citizens of the claimant's locality, setting forth that he has become so disabled that he can not make a living by manual labor and that he is entirely dependent on others for support.

J. D. Alexander, of Franklin County, Ark., testifies that he is a near neighbor to the claimant, and knows that he is so much afflicted with asthma and sciatica that he has to sleep in a sitting position, and is entirely unable to perform manual labor; further, that he is entirely dependent on others for a support.

William Alexander and N. M. Whitlock, citizens of the above county and State, corroborate under oath the foregoing statements relative to the claimant's physical and financial condition.

In view of the claimant's great age and helpless condition, your committee regard the bill as a meritorious one and its passage is therefore recommended with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $30 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill, and the first question is on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to know the present rate of pension that this soldier is receiving.

Mr. TERRY. The report shows that he is receiving $8 per month.

Mr. BUSHNELL. This rate is proposed to be increased to $24 per month, as I understand it. Heretofore it has been the custom not to extend these special pensions in such cases beyond $20.

Mr. TERRY. That is the amendment proposed here.

Mr. BUSHNELL, I understood the Clerk to read $24 per month.

Mr. TERRY. No; that was the bill as originally introduced. The amendment fixes the rate at $20.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I have no objection.

The amendment reported by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADELINE ALEXANDER.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1276) to pension Adeline Alexander.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the general pension laws and regulations, the name of Adeline Alexander, widow of Thomas C. Alexander, late a private in Company I, Thirteenth Regiment Vermont Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1276) granting a pension to Adeline Alexander, submit the following report: Thomas C. Alexander served as a wagoner in Company I, Thirteenth Vermont Volunteers, from August 25, 1862, to July 21, 1863; he died November 27, 1869. His widow, Adeline Alexander, was granted a pension from the date of his death to the date of her remarriage, November 29, 1878, and to a minor child of soldier from that date until November 1, 1882, when he became 16 years of age. These claims were allowed in March, 1890, and the arrears of pension due were paid to the proper parties.

It appears in evidence that the widow, Adeline Alexander, and Hiland Alexander were married November 29, 1878; the widow's claim for pension was filed February 8, 1886.

In an affidavit recently filed Mrs. Alexander states that after the death of the soldier his brother, Hiland Alexander, proposed marriage to her, and she at first refused, but he promised to be kind to her children and give her a comfortable home and support, but that after marriage he did not support her; never bought her a cent's worth of clothing, but spent all his earnings and part of hers for drink; he was cross and cruel to both her and her children until he died; that she supported her family by keeping boarders and by washing, but is now in poor health and unable to do much work, and has no means of support other than her daily labor.

There is on file a petition, signed by 35 names, stating that Hiland Alexander, the second husband, died February 18, 1891; that he was dissipated and did not aid much, if any, in supporting his wife and her children; that she is now in feeble health and without means of support.

Your committee therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not much think it ought to be laid aside with that recommendation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is just my opinion. We have got to stop this business sometime and somewhere.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the general law is against a proposition of this kind. If it is right to do it, then there ought to be a provision in the general law authorizing any woman who may marry a second husband—

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Especially if she gets a bad one.

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). And who forfeits a pension by reason of that marriage, that she shall be entitled to her pension at his death or when they are separated by divorce. If it is right that it should be done, then there ought to be a general law. There being no such general law, and the general law being against it, I do not think it should be done in these exceptional cases. It is a case that it would be very easy to provide for by general enactment, and it seems to me this is carrying it a little too far, particularly on the meager statement contained in the report.

Mr. RAY. But she was induced to go into the second marriage by fraud and deceit, as I understand it.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, no. Do you suppose a man who makes love to a woman and lies to her, or gives her a little taffy, can be guilty of fraud? Whoever heard of such a proposition?

Mr. RAY. But the report states that he promised to be kind to her.

Mr. KILGORE. Do they not all promise that?

Mr. RAY. But the report says he failed to carry out his promises.

Mr. KILGORE. Do not a great many of them do that? The taffy that a fellow gives to a woman when he is courting her can never be quoted against him, and ought not to be. The most of us would be in the penitentiary if it were so. [Laughter.] I would be inclined to resist the passage of this bill, or leave it to my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to resist it.

Mr. RAY. I would like to suggest that fraud and deceit vitiate all contracts.

Mr. KILGORE. A little misrepresentation of that kind, under such circumstances, is not fraud and deceit. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman who introduced this bill [Mr. GROUT], and having had it under examination, I will make an explanation.

Mr. KILGORE. He ought to have been here.

Mr. CURTIS. As stated in the report, this lady married after she became a pensioner by reason of the death of her first husband. After the death of this second husband she applied for a pension, which under the general law she could not obtain. She comes to Congress, as many other women have done, and it has been the policy of Congress to grant these pensions.

The fact that she married this second husband released the Government, during the time of her second marriage, from the payment of any pension, and it ought not to be pleaded as against the granting of this pension that she did an improper act. The Government should not place any obstacles in the way of these second marriages, that promise the care and support which are to be expected from marriage, but which, unfortunately in this case, were not realized, because this man turned out to be a vagabond and a drunkard.

This woman now asks Congress to restore that which she lost by marrying this man. There is no additional cost to the Government, but on the other hand during all these years of her second marriage the Government was relieved from the payment of this pension. This is what Congress has many times done, and it is now open to say whether we shall modify the rule in such cases.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Where will you fix the limitation? Suppose she marries again and makes another mistake, and the husband is divorced, and she comes back a third time? Would you be in favor of pensioning her again? Where will you stop this business?

Mr. CURTIS. Where is the injury to the Government? The Government is relieved from the payment of the pension in the mean time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman wants to know where the injury is to the Government. It is a great injury to Southern taxpayers who have to bear the burden and get none of the benefit.

Mr. CURTIS. But, my dear sir, the Southern taxpayer has been relieved from the payment of the pension during the time of the second marriage.

Mr. KILGORE. But the law affords that relief.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But then the burden is imposed upon us again, and this puts a premium on divorce in cases where the woman gets a bad man for a husband.

Mr. CURTIS. In this case her husband is dead and has been dead for eleven years.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the fact which is urged is not that he is dead, but that he was a bad husband while he was living.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, he was not only bad, but he is dead.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the best part of it, that he is dead, apparently.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the gentleman will have no further objection against the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not want to object, but we are getting very tired of this.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report them to the House with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

MRS. JENNIE B. MORRIS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1338) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie B. Morris, with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand a division.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered to the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of each of these bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of each of the bills reported by the committee to-night. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to make an inquiry, but without objecting. As I understand it, we can not order the previous question further than the engrossment and third reading of a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rules a motion could not be made for the previous question to the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bills, but the House can by unanimous consent do it. It can not be done by a motion.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I will not make objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I think I am inclined to object to it, because it is a very irregular way of doing business. When will they come up under that order?

The SPEAKER. To-morrow morning.

Mr. BAILEY. Before we pass further I think it is but fair that those that have been passed upon by the committee before should have preference over these bills. I am not inclined to object and do not intend to object; but I think we are giving preference to the work of to-night over the work that has been done on previous nights.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the same order be made as to the other bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar which now stand on the Calendar as unfinished business, and if any gentleman desires to ask time for discussion, I beg him to state it now, so that we may agree.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not understand the request.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered to the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of each one of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar now standing on the Calendar as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that on all bills that have been reported from the Committee of the Whole on Friday night sessions of the House the previous question be considered as ordered to the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bills.

Mr. KILGORE. With the right of discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman better have some understanding as to what time is to be allowed.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection, but I wish to state that this all means time being taken up in the House. We have some appropriation bills pending that we think it very important the House should dispose of, and I am opposed to putting all this Friday night business ahead of the day business in the House to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand, if the request should be granted to-night, the House to-morrow by unanimous consent could lay these bills aside. I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions would be perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. MARTIN. I would be willing to let them be laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will ask the chairman of the committee to consent to that.

Mr. MARTIN. I will do it very cheerfully.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; and the order will be entered in the Journal.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 30, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SLOOP UNION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the French spoliation claim arising out of the seizure of the sloop Union; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

R. H. OGILVIE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of R. H. Ogilvie vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TERMINATING REDUCTION OF ENGINEER CORPS OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 139) terminating the reduction in the numbers of the Engineer Corps of the Navy.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the reduction in the numbers of the Engineer Corps of the Navy provided for in the act approved August 5, 1882, shall be considered as having ceased on the 30th day of June, 1891.

SEC. 2. That any and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. I object.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection until I can explain the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I will withdraw the objection until the gentleman can explain the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his objection until the gentleman from Alabama can explain the bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I will explain to the gentleman from Georgia why I do not think he should object to this bill—

Mr. McMILLIN. We are unable to hear the gentleman from Alabama here, and I hope we will either have a little better order or that the gentleman will talk a little louder.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to make this explanation why I hope the House will entertain the bill. The act of 1882 provides for the reduction of the personnel of the Navy. All line officers were to be reduced; the surgeons were to be reduced, and also the engineers. All these reductions were to take place gradually, by the making of one appointment to every two vacancies. The reductions provided for in the law have all taken place, and the line officers are now at their normal number. That is also the case with the surgeons. The number of engineers was between three and four hundred at that time. My recollection is that there were something like three hundred and fifty, though I do not pretend to be accurate about that. The reduction has been gradually going on in the engineers, until now it is nearly at the point prescribed by the law of 1882. That was one hundred and seventy.

At the time this act would take effect, on the 30th of June last year, the number was one hundred and ninety-one. The proposition is to arrest the reduction at that point; and I will state to the House that the Navy as it is now constituted, needs all these engineers.

Mr. WATSON. What harm would come to the service if the reduction should go on until it reached the number prescribed by the act?

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether these engineers are steam engineers?

Mr. HERBERT. They are engineers.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Are part of them civil engineers?

Mr. HERBERT. No; they are not civil engineers. They are engineers; first, to design the engines and superintend the construction of them; and then, their principal duty is to take charge of the engines on ships. Their duties they are performing now is taking charge of engines on ships. They are necessary to run the ships; and they are also engaged wherever an engine is being built in inspecting the erection of the engine. Every pound of steel is weighed—

Mr. WATSON. Then, as I understand the gentleman from Alabama, this reduction is going on in accordance with a law that has been passed by Congress, is it not?

Mr. HERBERT. The reduction has been going on in accordance with the law of 1882, which fixes the number at 170.

Mr. WATSON. Now, if the reduction continues, we are simply obeying a law that Congress has passed.

Mr. HERBERT. If the reduction continues we are simply obeying that law passed in 1882; but let me tell the gentleman what will be the effect of that law. We have power to change that law; and the purpose of this act is to change it and arrest that reduction at one hundred and ninety-one, for the reason that since that law was passed thirty-nine new ships have been authorized, and quite a number of ships have gone on duty, and more are now going out on duty, and one hundred and seventy engineers are not enough to do the duty.

Mr. McMILLIN. How many of these ships are there that require engineers?

Mr. HERBERT. Well, I can not say exactly; but there are thirty or forty.

Mr. McMILLIN. And you want one hundred and ninety-one for that number of ships?

Mr. HERBERT. There are probably forty-five.

Mr. McMILLIN. It seems to me there ought not to be any scarcity of engineers under those circumstances.

Mr. HERBERT. There is a scarcity of engineers, because there are anywhere from forty to fifty now employed in the inspection and supervision of engines under construction, and when these ships are completed they will be needed to run them.

Mr. McMILLIN. That leaves more than four engineers to a vessel.

Mr. HERBERT. It takes more than four engineers to each of these ships, but some of these engineers will all the time be on duty on shore.

Mr. DOCKERY. What amount of money is carried by the bill?

Mr. HERBERT. No money is carried by the bill. The appropriations made for the pay of officers will be sufficient.

Mr. McMILLIN. The method of reduction adopted in the act which this bill operates to repeal is the only way in which we can ever diminish the number of officers in any of these branches of the public service. I have seen the effort made time after time in different Departments to reduce the number of officers by dismissals; but that can never be accomplished. The only practical method is to let the incumbents die off, and provide by law that their places shall not be filled until the aggregate number has been reduced to a certain limit. Now, even that method of decapitation, which, though very slow, is sure, is to be stopped by this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman talks about reducing the number of officers. I have been on the Naval Committee for about seven years, and during that time there has never been any increase in the number of officers.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the only substantial way in which we can ever accomplish a diminution of the number is by such a law as this bill proposes to interfere with.

Mr. HERBERT. But the reduction provided for by the existing law really cripples the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy and every member of our committee—all who have given any examination to this matter—are convinced that the reduction should not extend below one hundred and ninety-one. Indeed, there is a bill now pending before the committee to increase the number to three hundred and twenty. That bill has been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy—

Mr. McMILLIN. The same officer who recommends the present bill?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir. But the committee has not recommended that other bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the recommendation made by the Secretary of the Navy in that case shows that, like any other mortal, he may err.

Mr. HERBERT. But it does not show that the committee is wrong in recommending a part of what he approves. I submit to the gentleman that when the appropriate committee has examined this question thoroughly and become entirely convinced that the number proposed is needed, it is only fair that the House should be allowed to decide the question.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I would not captiously object to the consideration of any gentleman's bill. But this measure involves a policy and a principle; and any gentleman who differs with my friend from Alabama as to the wisdom of that policy or that principle, and who allows the bill to come up by unanimous consent, is responsible for its passage if it should be passed. When bills of this kind come up in the regular way and are passed by the House, only those gentlemen who vote for them are responsible; but when they come up here by unanimous consent, all of us who do not object while we are opposed to the measure are responsible.

Now, no one can be blind to the fact that there is a systematic and earnest attempt to increase the Navy. I object to that; I do not think it is right; I do not think any increase is needed. Now, if the gentleman can bring his bill up regularly and have it passed I am not responsible; but when bills are passed in this way I and all others who tacitly consent are responsible. I renew my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BUNN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. JONES, for to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. RUSK, for to-day, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; and I ask that gentlemen having reports to present from committees be allowed to file them with the Clerk.

Mr. BOWERS. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will allow me to send up a resolution.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN. Last night, as the Chair is aware, a special order was adopted in regard to certain bills which had been considered by the Committee of the Whole. I do not wish to object to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, but I would like to know what will be the parliamentary status of those bills in the event that this consent is given.

The SPEAKER. They would maintain their present status, the previous question having been ordered on their passage.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. DICKERSON. I will not object, if the gentleman from Georgia will yield a moment to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Georgia withdraws his request the Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. CAPEHART].

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman says he will object, of course I will have to withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent—

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Kentucky objected to my request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. DICKERSON. I do not want to be driven to that. My only wish was that the gentleman from Indiana might be recognized for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman objected and made a condition that he was to decide who should be recognized. The Chair discharges the duty of recognition [laughter], and recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia, who asks unanimous consent—

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will allow us to go on with the diplomatic and consular bill.

Mr. DICKERSON. I withdraw my objection. I do not wish to appear as undertaking to usurp the authority of the Speaker.

There being no objection, the request of Mr. BLOUNT that by unanimous consent reports of committees be filed with the Clerk, and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OATES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 14, 15, and 16 and insert, in lieu thereof: "Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Venezuela, $7,500."

Mr. BLOUNT. On that, Mr. Chairman, tellers were ordered, and on the last vote no quorum appeared.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will please resume their places as tellers.

Mr. McMILLIN. The vote will be taken anew, I suppose?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the Clerk be directed to read the lines proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read lines 14, 15, and 16, which this motion would strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Venezuela and Guatemala, $5,000 each, $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the amendment will be to strike out Guatemala and increase the appropriation from $5,000 to $7,500 for the minister to Venezuela.

Mr. BURROWS. This is a proposition to reduce the salary of the minister to Venezuela.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I object to debate. It is no such thing.

Mr. BURROWS. The present law, I believe, provides a salary of $7,500.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman means that, I have no objection to his statement, although it is misleading.

Mr. BURROWS. This bill as reported changes the existing law, and this amendment, as I understand it, restores the present law.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendment is to change the item in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the proposition is to increase the appropriation.

Mr. BURROWS. And that increase makes it the existing law.

Mr. HITT. When I submitted this amendment I stated that if it should prevail I would then offer a further amendment to provide for Guatemala. This amendment, if adopted, restores the present law.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to debate, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, which has just been read.

The question was taken; the committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 19, noes 149.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Denmark, Sweden and Norway, $7,500.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 21, 22, and 23 and insert:

“Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Sweden and Norway, and to Denmark, $7,500 each, $15,000.”

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed is intended to continue the mission to Denmark and to Sweden and Norway according to existing law and long-established precedent. If Congress must economize in our diplomatic service, it should not do so in the way proposed.

First. Because the Constitution gives Congress no power to decide to what countries a minister shall be sent. The Executive of the United States alone must take the initiative in either establishing or abolishing missions. The Executive alone must decide when diplomatic agents are necessary and to what countries they should be sent. Congress may increase or reduce the salaries to be paid, but with that its power ceases. This bill proposes to coerce the Executive into accrediting one minister to two different powers.

Second. Important affairs have been submitted to arbitration, and the executives of European Governments will select a majority of the arbitrators. To make a change in our diplomatic representation at those courts in a manner which cannot be construed as friendly, in a manner calculated to indicate that we do not esteem the importance of those countries as highly as we have formerly, would at this time be the reverse of wisdom; it would be economy gone mad. It would jeopardize millions of dollars to make a show of retrenchment in a political campaign. The people will not be deceived by it.

Third. We have invited foreign nations to take part in the Columbian Exposition. Denmark has made a liberal appropriation and in a friendly spirit. Shall we respond by abolishing our legation at Copenhagen?

Fourth. The Scandinavian countries have contributed to the wealth and power of this country. Many of our best citizens are Swedes, Norwegians, and Danes. They are industrious, thrifty, law-abiding, and in becoming citizens of this country they have not merely bettered their own condition, but increased our national wealth. They are frugal, sturdy, enterprising, and successful. They have kinsmen in the land of their birth; they have interests there; they have rights which need protection, and I warn the Democratic party that throughout the great Northwest the abolition or degradation of the missions to Sweden and Norway and to Denmark will not be received by approval, but with resentment by many thousands of Scandinavian citizens who are entitled to consideration.

I urge the House to disapprove the consolidation of these missions, because it is an infringement of the constitutional rights of the President; because we are prosecuting a peaceful arbitration with foreign judges; because of the Columbian Exposition, which requires friendly diplomatic aid; because there are thousands of our citizens who would feel insulted and whose interests would be put in jeopardy; because the United States is a power of the first magnitude, desiring to maintain friendly relations with other nations and to send and receive accredited diplomatic agents according to custom, and because we should observe international usage and demand international consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT was recognized.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa desires to proceed I should like to hear what is to be said in favor of this amendment before taking the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, in the same words, I have in my hand and had intended to offer. But I am very glad it was presented by a member on that side of the House for this reason, that heretofore gentlemen on that side have been submitting amendments to the bill and then declining to vote for them. This sort of proceeding has left the committee without a quorum. But here is an amendment that I call upon every Republican of this House to approve and to show that approval by a vote for it. I don't want buncombe now, and if you mean business and want a minister to Denmark and one to Sweden and Norway here is your opportunity. Let every Republican member come up and vote on this proposition and we on the Democratic side will make a quorum on the first vote.

I believe a country that has furnished us so much of our best population, in the seven States usually called the great Northwest, numbering about a million of people from those three nations, among the very best who have ever settled in any country, who are now living there and forming an important part of all the interests which we have—I believe such a country should be properly considered. I believe it to be the proper policy of our country to be represented by a minister in every land that has furnished us any large proportion of our citizenship. We have civic relations with them every day in the year. It is necessary for us to have an envoy at these capitals who can properly represent us.

These are not small or weak nations. You have already provided for a minister at $7,500 for Uruguay and Paraguay, and yet the population of those two countries is not as large as that of Norway or of Sweden or of Denmark, and here are three countries, each one of which has a greater population, a population in which we are more interested, which it is proposed to give but one minister instead of two as formerly. Peru and Bolivia you have provided with a minister, and yet the population of the two does not reach the population of Sweden alone.

I go further and say that, although in this particular case we should have a minister on account of the importance of the relations of those countries to us, yet I would go further and say I believe, as a general policy, this country ought to have a minister at the capital of every republic on the face of the earth, to show to those peoples who have adopted the popular form of sovereignty that they have a friend in the United States of America. And in countries not republics we should be represented at every capital where we have extended commercial relations or which has given to us any considerable number of our citizens. In this latter class the Scandinavian countries are especially included.

Now, let me say again to my Republican friends, let us have a quorum on the first vote, if you mean business.

I regret that the time is too short to permit extended discussion, but I call upon the friends of this amendment to rally on the first vote and show a decided majority.

Mr. BRYAN of Nebraska was constantly in attendance during the week to speak in favor of this amendment. He is necessarily absent at this time, and at his request I read the following statement for him:

I had prepared an amendment substantially like the one now before the committee, but since this has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST], I desire to say a word in favor of its adoption. In the Statesman's Year Book for 1892 I find that the three countries, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, furnished, in 1882, 105,226 immigrants to this country; in 1891, 60,107, and a total for the last ten years of more than 600,000. These people have gone largely to the Northwestern States, and have contributed their full share to the growth and prosperity of that section. They are a brave and liberty-loving people; industrious, sober, and intelligent; they deserve well of their adopted Government. There must be much correspondence between these people and the relatives left behind, besides more or less visiting back and forth.

Complications necessarily arise in the settlement of ancestral estates and it is important that our diplomatic and consular service shall furnish all necessary assistance. It only costs about $15,000 per annum to support the present diplomatic service, and for the last ten years has cost only about 23 cents for each immigrant from those countries. These people have brought with them money and property and have thus added to the nation's wealth, not to speak of that still greater sum which by their brain and muscle they have contributed to our wealth-producing forces. The bill as reported by the committee consolidates the two missions which we now have and appropriates $7,500 for the one thus formed. While I sympathize with the committee in their desire to economize, I can not favor the change recommended, lest it may operate to the injury and embarrassment of this worthy and considerable portion of people. I hope the amendment before the committee will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I think when my friend unites with the other side on anything he can always get a quorum. I think if he will move to strike down this bill wherever it changes existing law he will find that he can get a quorum every time.

Mr. Chairman, the population of Denmark is 2,185,000. The population of Pennsylvania is 4,282,000, and I might name several States in this Union far exceeding that country in point of population. It is contiguous to Sweden and Norway. There is no difficulty in a minister representing this Government at Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, any more than there is in the minister to Greece representing also Roumania and Servia; in fact, there is very much less difficulty.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I will, Mr. Chairman, but I do not see how I can ever make a statement if I am to be interrupted.

Mr. HAUGEN. Where is it contemplated that this minister shall reside? At Copenhagen or at Stockholm?

Mr. POST. At both places!

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no; the gentleman does not expect him to reside at both places at the same time. I do not know where he would reside.

Mr. SNODGRASS. He may choose his own residence.

Mr. BLOUNT. He may choose his own residence. He may go to one place or the other. But suppose he should go to Sweden or Norway instead of Copenhagen. We have a consul-general at Copenhagen. There can be no difficulty in the event of any question arising in relation to any Scandinavian matter.

Mr. POST. We have a consul at Copenhagen, but not a consul-general.

Mr. BLOUNT. We have a consul-general, and if the gentleman sees fit to examine the map made by the State Department he will see that that is the fact. The State Department have furnished us with a map showing that at Copenhagen there is a consul-general.

Mr. HITT. That is a mistake. I have here the official list for January. He is a consul, but not a consul-general.

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well; suppose he should happen to be a consul and not a consul-general; if any question arises the person aggrieved can go immediately before the consul and make his complaint, and it can be communicated to the minister. You can not have a minister at every place. You have one minister to Germany and you have towns and cities in every direction there. The grievance may occur at one point and the minister be at another, and he may actually be farther away than could ever be the case as the result of the union of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the object of doing away with the minister?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am endeavoring to state, and if gentlemen will allow me, I should prefer to proceed. I do not mean any discourtesy at all to my friend, but I have been interrupted two or three times and have not been able to say anything.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I only wanted to know. I supposed it was customary to give some reason for such action.

Mr. BLOUNT. I see the gentleman simply wants to get into my time with a view to making a criticism on this proposition. The five-minute debate is open, and I hope the gentleman will resort to that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall be most happy to. I shall be delighted.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, you can certainly have the privilege, and you can be as happy as you please.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is the most courteous chairman of a committee I have ever known.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can not arraign me for a lack of courtesy.

Mr. CAPEHART. Something he does not possess himself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have nothing to say about that. Mr. Chairman, the proposition here is to reduce the amount of expenses in this bill by the sum of $5,000, where there can come, in the opinion of the committee, no detriment to the public service. Years ago, sir, when the Democratic party were in possession of this House, they made far more extensive reductions than these. They were arraigned just as they are now. In the last Congress the appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service and other branches of the service were increased. We arraigned the party in this House for it. We have proclaimed their extravagance throughout this land. We have assembled here to undertake to turn back that tide of extravagance.

We have pledged ourselves to the country, and for one, I am here in this mission, and in every item of this bill answering the demands of the country and carrying out my pledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

It is a very usual matter, sir, that where we want to do a thing we find a way to do it. There is no complaint that I have heard of our Scandinavian population suffering for want of representation. They do not believe that there will be any great wrong done to them when we shall have made this combination now proposed. This Government occupies a position among the nations of the earth which commands respect for its citizens in the countries of the Old World. Gentlemen talk as though we lived in the century past.

We have, as I have already stated, a consul with whom ready communication can be had. That position is right in the midst of Europe, where communication can be had instantly. There are great facilities for relieving a person where he is oppressed by the Government or by its citizens. If anything should occur, sir, where there is any matter of force, communication has to be made with the minister, negotiations have to be commenced, and correspondence had with a view to relieving such a person.

Mr. Chairman, no person values the Scandinavians who have settled in the Northwestern section of our country more than I do. I wish, sir, that it would increase far beyond what it has reached at this time; but when they come into this land they come and make a part of this people. They come and identify themselves in thought, in feeling, and in aspirations with those who make a part of this great Republic. Its policies are their policies. In the Northwest, I take it, there are Scandinavian people by the thousands. There are in various sections of this country thousands of them, homogeneous in feeling, acting with us in our political organizations with an enthusiasm and vigor that does not arrest the progress of economy and reform by the suggestions we have heard to-day; and I beg, sir, that this committee will see to it that this measure in all its propositions shall be carried through the committee and reported to the House.

There is not a single point where objections will not be made; there is not a single change where criticism will not come; there is not a point where gentlemen will not see fit to arraign the Democratic party for what it is doing. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST] has just told us that the people would not stand this thing. Why, sir, the gentleman ought to be a better prophet than that. His side ought to know better, even without the gift of prophecy. They passed their extravagant expenditures in the last Congress, and proclaimed their liberality and the liberality of the American people. They prophesied then, and they were false prophets, to the extent that they do not occupy one-third of the political power of this House.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is pending.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw it.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, much as I dislike to differ in opinion with the distinguished gentleman the chairman of that committee, and the committee itself, in the reductions proposed in this bill, I do feel and believe that this is economy in the wrong direction. I am informed by good authority that several Democratic Houses in the past, have approved and recommended the salaries which have prevailed and prevail now. I am informed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] who had the honor of being chairman of that committee at one time, that he recommended the salaries as they are now; I have waited in suspense to hear some reason, some stable reason, other than that of economy, why we should begin economizing by reducing appropriations for our foreign service. I have not yet heard anything amounting to reasons why we should begin reduction at that end of the line. There are thousands of places in this country where we could reduce, and where we ought to begin these reductions. But this is the wrong place.

Here are three distinct nations, having no relation or connection with each other; nations among which disputes may arise and ill feeling are likely to spring up between them. If we have a representative in one of those nations the others will become jealous, and ill feeling will result therefrom. In one case we utterly ignore two of these nations, and say you are not worthy of a representative from America, but we give it to the other one. We say to Norway and Sweden, for instance, you can go over to Denmark and transact business with our minister, but we can not afford to send you one, as we have done in the past. I grant that it is our duty to economize, but not to disgrace this country in the eyes of foreign nations by withdrawing our resident minister in order to save the cost of keeping him there. Whatever else we may do, we ought to have a just American pride in our own country and in its being well represented in all foreign countries.

It is not a question of saving a few dollars, or a few thousand dollars. It is a question of the integrity and honor of this nation among foreign countries. We have had this mission supported and maintained by Democratic Congresses, and maintained by a Democratic Administration; and now, without any reason except what seems to me to be false economy, it is proposed to withdraw the minister from Norway and Sweden, and say to these people that you are not of sufficient importance for us to continue our relations with you any longer. Have you heard any reason that justifies you in doing that? Does the saving of the paltry sum of $5,000, now paid to our minister there, justify you in assuming such an attitude towards those two countries? No. I have heard no reason satisfactory to my mind why we should begin to economize at that end of the line. The emigration from those three countries is among the most desirable in this country. They are among the most prosperous, frugal, and law-abiding citizens we have. I trust the amendment will prevail.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last line. I wish to say that, in my judgment, this Congress ought to do with reference to Denmark just what has been done by this country from time immemorial. We have never heretofore been without a minister to Denmark, and I do not believe the time has come, if it ever can come, when a Democratic House of Congress ought to say that this mission should be abolished. Among our best citizens in the Northwest are the Danes and Swedes and Norwegians. They are among the most desirable citizens that we have, and their numbers are large, especially in the Northwest. They are patriotic, industrious, and intelligent—among the very best people anywhere.

We have almost every day transactions that lead to communications with every one of these Scandinavian countries, and we need the best facilities that we can have for transacting this business. Certainly we do not desire that Congress shall adopt a measure which will place us in a worse position in this respect than we have occupied since the beginning of the Government.

We do not believe this is a good place to undertake retrenchment. We are in favor of retrenchment and economy; but this attempt in that direction is not one to be favored. On behalf of the whole Northwest, on behalf of the interests of the whole country, we ask that this mission to Denmark be not abolished.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to continue the law as it has been enacted by this House with the concurrence of the Senate and the President—to continue this mission in Denmark, as well as that of Sweden and Norway, as it has stood for many years. Recently, owing to particular circumstances, it was thought that the mission to Denmark ought to be raised in grade and pay. It was done; and the response came at once in a message from the Government of Denmark, showing warm appreciation of the action of the Government of the United States. The great number of people from that country who have become citizens of ours and returned has created a reflex feeling of cordial attachment to and kindly regard for the United States.

The officers connected with the organization of the great Exposition at Chicago who went abroad reported that the proposition received a most cordial reception in Scandinavian countries, perhaps more so than in any other part of the world. An able minister of the United States in Denmark—an active, practical American—was there doing all he could to promote that feeling. The Parliament of Denmark, a country at which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] sneered on account of its meagerness of population and narrowed square miles, appropriated more for this great international display in America, in proportion to population, than any other country in the whole world. That bill, recently passed, was about to reach the executive when the telegraph carried the news that this Congress proposed to sweep away the mission to that country as something not worth maintaining. Its effect has already been most unfavorable to our interests.

If this measure be adopted, what will be left there in the way of representation of our country? We have only one consul in all Denmark, and that of the lowest grade above the trading class of consuls; the rest are foreigners who act as consular agents. If you abandon the mission to that country you chill the feelings of many of your citizens, and repel the cordial response that came to us after the recent action of this House and the Senate.

This step is ill-timed; its adoption would be most unfortunate just when we are appealing to all the nations of the earth to come here and join us in this great international fête. Denmark is one of the leading countries in the whole world in art in its best and noblest forms. It is the country where the genius of Thorwaldsen gave an impulse to art that affected all northern Europe. In the great exposition at Paris in '78 I have spent hours in examining the beautiful and marvelous fabrics—those triumphs of sculpture, of painting, and of decorative art, the fruits of the recent impulse given to the bright possibilities of Danish genius. We want these people and their noble and beautiful work at Chicago; yet this Congress is asked to enact here to-day a proposition expressing how little we care for Denmark and Sweden and Norway, and which will certainly defeat the whole appropriation now awaiting the signature of the executive at Copenhagen.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew the pro forma amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has referred to what he denominated my "sneer" at Denmark. If to state the population of that country is a sneer it seems to me that a sneer and the truth are very nearly alike. The gentleman certainly had no reason for saying that I had sneered at that country. In his portrayal of the industrial character of that people he might have called the attention of the House to the fact that while they have advanced immensely in the matter of manufacturing, yet, next to Germany and England, the trade of Denmark is greater with Sweden and Norway than with any other country on the face of the earth.

Those countries lie contiguous to each other, and the intercourse between them is enormous. There exists between their people by reason of business relations the greatest intimacy. If the gentleman had gone farther and looked at the trade between that country and ours he would have seen that the exports are very small, and if the gentleman had referred to the action of the last Congress in the matter of preventing trade with these people he would have disclosed the flimsiness of the pretense that we are to seek trade with them by inviting them to the Chicago Exposition. It is proposed to invite their exhibits as a great patriotic movement and at the same time to stay their intercourse with us by "McKinley tariff" legislation. It is all nonsense to talk in this way, to suppose that the cutting down of this mission is to be the cause of their staying away from Chicago. Why, Mr. Chairman, has it come to this, that the American House of Representatives does not dare to change the salary of a minister or to determine its own missions because of the apprehension that somebody somewhere else may get "mad" about it?

The gentleman says that when the bill was reported with this proposition to unite the missions of Sweden and Norway the information came by telegraph from Denmark that this might interfere with the representation of that country at Chicago. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that intimation came by telegraph, and the substance of it was communicated by the Secretary of State; and it was a communication from the minister whose very place is involved. It was he who saw the danger in regard to the exhibit at Chicago. The gentleman from Illinois told us the other day that the Danish minister to this country thought there was danger the exhibit of Denmark at Chicago might be abandoned if we did this thing.

A communication comes to this House indirectly from the Danish minister attacking this legislation—a communication violative of all the rules of propriety on the part of a foreign minister. His communications have no place here; and conceding that they have, I fancy that there is a large sympathy among these gentlemen in diplomatic circles here and abroad. It is very singular that such a communication should come in this sort of a way to this House.

Gentlemen ask me for a reason. I have given it, that it retrenches expenditure, this combination of missions. I will undertake to say that there is not an objection, in a practical or tangible way, offered to the action of the committee; and the contention that this may cause inconvenience or misapprehension in the minds of American citizens of Danish birth traversing Denmark has no foundation in fact. They can not discover any situation which makes it necessary to continue this mission there at $7,500 a year.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, if the pro forma amendment is withdrawn I desire to renew it.

The recent diplomatic experiences of this country have been such as to demonstrate that American envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary are not only not necessary, nor useful, nor desirable, but have ceased to be even ornamental. They seem to exist for the purpose of getting us into troubles which they are powerless to extricate us from.

If the proposition embraced in the pending bill was to radically reform our diplomatic service by the wholesale and wholesome wiping out of the whole system of high-titled functionaries, and placing the foreign business of this nation on a business basis, I would cheerfully support it.

But that is not the proposition. The proposition is to retain these functionaries everywhere, I think, except to the Scandinavian countries of Northern Europe. It cuts off, or rather consolidates these countries in the manner suggested for the sake of economy, as we are told. It says to these nations we can not afford to give you the whole of a minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary, and therefore we will give you but half of ont. It does this because our trade, they say, is slight with these countries. That is true. But I want to call your attention to the fact that our social relations with them are great. The people whom Sweden, Norway, and Denmark have sent to us are among the most industrious, best educated, and law-abiding, moral and Christianized people who have come to our shores from the ports of the Old World.

So long as you maintain these envoys extraordinary, and, I have almost forgotten the rest of the title [laughter], everywhere else, and maintain them as you do, wholly as a matter of courtesy, I insist that as a matter of courtesy, not merely to the people of these countries over the water, but to the people who have already come to our shores and have made their homes with us and are a part and parcel of ourselves, that you shall maintain with the courts of their fatherland these envoys extraordinary and mininters plenipotentiary in all the pomp, pride, and circumstance of ancient and antiquated diplomacy.

This amendment is precisely in the language of one which I had drawn and intended to present to the committee. I hope that it will receive the support of the members upon both sides of this House.

I withdraw the pro forma motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope not, on such an important provision of the bill as this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I shall have to move to rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. The debate has been running but a very few minutes, and certainly the gentleman might be willing to allow it to go on for a little while longer.

Mr. BLOUNT. We have already consumed a long time upon this bill, and I move that the committee rise, to limit debate.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It is in line with the spirit that animated the committee that drew the bill—to shut off debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. The committee that drew that bill has a spirit as broad and liberal as the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And far more parsimonious and mean.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; and the gentleman is often in that attitude towards the majority.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And you carry out this spirit when you try to shut off debate as you propose here.

Mr. BLOUNT. And you are not always with me; but I am with my side.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am certainly not with you in such a proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman will not shut off debate when we have had but fifteen minutes on this provision.

The CHAIRMAN (after submitting the question). The yeas seem to have it.

Mr. REED. What is the question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to rise to limit debate. If we can agree in committee I should be glad.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The chairman of the committee a few moments ago relegated me to the five-minutes discussion to find out something about this proposition. Now, as he will not give the information himself, he wants to cut off all debate and permit nobody else to give it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am perfectly willing to indicate any reasonable time if an agreement can be had. If gentlemen will indicate—

Mr. POST. Let the debate run for a few minutes longer.

Mr. BLOUNT. All I wish is that there shall be some limit. If gentlemen want a half hour—

Mr. REED. A half hour!

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to my friend that he let the debate run awhile under the five-minute rule, and then I think we will be able to agree upon time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, as there seems to be a disposition to allow the debate to run further I shall not press my own wish about it. The object that I had was to facilitate the bill, which I supposed was the desire of the House, and certainly I have no disposition to prevent discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his motion?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know why it is that I am not allowed to amend this bill the same as other gentlemen have done, by moving to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that I have no desire to cut him off.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I had risen to my feet three times—

Mr. BLOUNT. I was not aware of it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You are wasting my time now. Let me use what I have got.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will let you go on, and will give you more time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I want to say to this House that I shall vote for this amendment. I want to rebuke the spirit of parsimony exhibited in this effort to consolidate the Danish, Swedish, and Norwegian missions. I want to say to this Committee of the Whole that in the Fifty-first Congress there were just as many members of Scandinavian birth as there were members born in Ireland and in Germany. I want to say, furthermore, that in my opinion this report, so far as it concerns that mission, is an insult to two million of our Scandinavian-born citizens.

Now I wish to refer to another action of the Committee on Foreign Affairs which you have already sanctioned. You have done injustice not only to these monarchical Scandinavian countries, but you have gone further and done injustice to your own sister republics in South America. You have consolidated the missions to Peru and Bolivia, and the missions to Ecuador and Colombia. You have reduced the salary of the minister to Venezuela. I rebuke this niggardliness. It means virtually legislation in favor of the rich and against the poor. [Applause.] By reducing these salaries you place the offices in the hands of the plutocrats, as you call them [applause on the Republican side] and you refuse them to the educated and honest laboring or professional man. The rich can fill them and the poor can not.

Sir, again I appeal to the members of this House not to place this Government in a position where it will be regarded as the one giant miser among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield my time to the gentleman from New York. [After a pause.] I do not know whether he understood me or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I trust that before the House acts on the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Illinois, it will fully appreciate the importance of the proposition of the committee to consolidate the missions of these three countries, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. I have listened in vain for any other reason than that of mere economy, for the proposition of the committee. Mr. Chairman, those countries are, except geographically, as distinctly divided as Spain is divided from England. And the distance from one country to the other is, I believe, greater than the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] believes. There is no more reason why these missions should be consolidated than there is for a consolidation between Italy and Switzerland.

Now, there is every reason why this is not a fortunate time to make this consolidation. The tide of travel for purposes of pleasure is constantly increasing to this section of Europe. Every year Americans visit, more and more, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The occasion for the use of this important office becomes greater every year, not only with the increase of travel to those sections, but with the increase of immigration from those countries to this. Those countries are every year pouring out their wealth of manhood upon this country, and with that outpouring our duties to those countries every year increase.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when with the increase of our citizenship from these sources grave complications may arise, when the possibility of such complications is increasing, it seems to me this is a wrong time for this country to offer, not only to ignore those conditions, but to offer what is practically an affront to those nations. For it is nothing else. To Denmark this means that she is considered so insignificant that she is no longer to count as an independent nation, and to Norway and Sweden there is the same significance: that they are so small in the eyes of this country that for the purpose of saving a few hundred dollars we may offer to the mother countries of hundreds of thousands of our fellow-citizens the affront of charging them with insignificance. This is a serious matter, Mr. Chairman, and there should be some better reason given for it than the mere consideration of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pro forma amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am in favor of this amendment for another reason than any of those that have been stated, although they might be sufficiently abundant; and that other reason is that I believe there are no people in Europe who are more thoroughly imbued with the spirit of self-government than are the people of these three Scandinavian countries. There are no people in Europe to-day who are in such close sympathy with the free government of the United States as are the people of the Scandinavian countries. They consider us their model, and are well informed as to our form of government.

There is more self-government in Norway than in any other European country, unless it be Switzerland and England. Whoever will take pains to read the magnificent and excellent work of Mr. Brice on American institutions will learn from it that he places the Scandinavian countries, especially Norway, with her popular form of government, far in advance of England, and the only country that approaches it is Switzerland. Mr. Brice is certainly an impartial and disinterested witness.

Now, why should we select these countries in an effort to reduce expenses? It is true their populations are not very numerous compared with the larger powers of Europe. This bill, in its very next item, appropriates $7,500 to maintain our diplomatic relations with Korea. The intercourse of this country with any one of the Scandinavian countries far exceeds in importance, commercially and otherwise, that with Korea.

It is a little strange and a little out of harmony, I think, to select these countries for the ax of the economist. Gentlemen do not understand the relations of the Scandinavian countries to each other. They are entirely separate. Their governments are constitutional and liberal. It is only fair to say that King Oscar II is the most liberal monarch in Europe, unless it be King Humbert, of Italy. No one who has read the history of the late constitutional conflict in Norway but will admit this. So that this proposed legislation would be a slight offered not only to the people but to the chief executive of those countries. At this very moment that we are discussing this matter of consolidating the missions in those countries we find that in Sweden and Norway they are considering the propriety of separating their missions to foreign nations; Norway desires separate missions, and it is not unreasonable to expect that they will accomplish it, and that Norway and Sweden will soon have independent foreign service. The late change of ministry in Norway was the direct result of an election where this separate foreign service was the leading issue and its advocates victorious.

Gentlemen do not understand the relations between Norway and Sweden. It can hardly be expected that they should. It is true they have one king, but in every other respect they are entirely independent of each other. Norway, under the constitution of 1814, is entirely separate from Sweden in every respect. It has its own legislature and ministry responsible to the people of Norway only. The only question with them is as to whether they can afford a separate foreign service. The present minister to the United States is from Norway, I believe. The King selects from either country the representatives to other nations. Now, while these countries are working in the direction of separation, and for the purpose of sending separate representatives to foreign nations, it seems to me that this country ought not to take the course proposed here and try to consolidate our missions to them into one with Denmark. It is not treating them with the courtesy and consideration which we ought to show people so friendly towards us and our institutions.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CASTLE. Mr. Chairman, I think I represent as many of the yellow-haired and blue-eyed race of the north as a majority of the members of this House represent citizens of all nationalities, and I certainly can not permit a measure of this character to pass without entering my solemn protest against it. It is true, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has said, that it is in the interest of pure parsimony. It is also true, as others have said, that it is a discrimination against a grand people.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] has alluded to the fact that there are hundreds of thousands in this country whose fathers still reside in the old land, and who will be affected by this measure and resent it. Why, Mr. Chairman, if I have read history aright, this same ancient race has imbued our proud Anglo-Saxon, the all-conquering nation, with about all of worth or valor there is in it. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Danes and Saxons and the Normans were all members of this grand Scandinavian people. Before Peter the Hermit told his beads or made his first invocation Harold Hadrada, the northern Viking, had swept from his pathway the Saracen and robber, bathed in the Jordan, and knelt at the Holy Cross.

Six hundred years before Columbus looked upon San Salvador Lief Erickson planted the standard of the Sea Kings upon the shores of New England. Now, sir, this bill proposes to humiliate this great ancestral race of ours. The most contemptible of men are those who ignore the land of their birth and the home of their fathers, who despise the humble root-tree and the lowly father and mother. Such men will be a curse and vagabondage to any country. But, sir, show me the man who does honor and reverence to both, and I will show you one who will always be a credit to his own land and that of his adoption.

The Scandinavian people in our country to-day represent a portion more nearly homogeneous with our own—with all kindness to other nationalities—than any other race of men living on the face of the earth. They are in full sympathy with our institutions. They come here imbued with the spirit of republicanism and assimilate as easily with the laws and political institutions of our great Commonwealth as though to the manner born. And, Mr. Chairman, there is another thing that I do not wish to be omitted. In my own State more than 300,000 of the population are Scandinavians. At the outbreak of the war the old First Minnesotawas the first regiment tendered the United States. Of that regiment nearly three-tenths were Scandinavians.

There was not a battlefield from Bull Run to Appomattox that was not drenched with Scandinavian blood. They have not perchance a birthright inheritance in our land, but they have one far better which is written in blood. And, sir, search the records of this country as you may, and you can not find where a man of that race has ever been disloyal to its institutions. They are the successful pioneers of our Western progress. Come with me to my own State, the "Star of the North;" go into the pine forests, among the hills, over the prairies, and along the banks of the great lakes and rivers, and you will see how these men have made that fair country blossom like the rose.

They have hewed from the forest and planted upon the prairie the evidences of the highest type of modern civilization. They have created the model homes and communities of the true American citizen.

While it is true, as many Western gentlemen have said upon this floor, that there is a depression in the business affairs of the great West, and that mortgages are more plentiful than money, it is not true so far as relates to this people.

They are the only people, I think, in all the West and in all the country who are practically free from the incubus of debt and the grasp of the mortgagee.

I represent three counties almost entirely Scandinavian, and those three have less of debt and less of mortgages than any other communities of which I have knowledge, either in the East or West. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, a good argument can be made in favor of the abolition of our system of diplomatic service; such an argument has been made here; and while I can not assent to the conclusion, still there may be some reason in it. But it seems to me that if we are to maintain the diplomatic service at all, we ought not in making provision for the expense of that service to discriminate against the countries of the Scandinavian peninsula. And it is not only true that a large section of the agricultural West and the agricultural Northeast has been settled by the people of Norway and Sweden and Denmark, but it is also true, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN] has said, that these countries are practically one with us in their political aspirations.

It is an established precept of international law, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] said the other day, that one of the methods of expressing a want of consideration for a country is to reduce the dignity and importance of the mission to that country. And in view of this recognized precept it seems to me the action of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is an indefensible disparagement of Norway and Sweden as well as of the Kingdom of Denmark.

Nor can I forbear to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this discrimination comes at a rather inopportune time, especially in the case of Denmark; for it is remembered that the Kingdom of Denmark was second among the countries of Europe to agree to the treaty admitting American food products, both of bread and of meat, and that the present minister at Copenhagen has been among the most useful and efficient of our diplomatic agents in forwarding that great commercial project. His service at that capital, the fruits of which we already enjoy, has been worth many times all we have paid in maintaining that mission in the last twenty years.

For these reasons, and a dozen more that suggest themselves, I protest, not only for the sake of our Government, but also in the name of thousands of Scandinavian people who have settled and contributed to the prosperity of great communities in the Northwest against the disparagement and discredit that is cast upon these countries by the report of the committee. These people have brought with them to the United States the habits of industry, sobriety, and thrift that have made the hills of their native country productive beyond the promise of their soil and climate. They are the makers of wealth and the builders of homes. They are believers in the United States of America. Thousands of them followed the flag of the Republic in the great struggle for the national life.

I can not by my vote consent that, within a few months after the dust of John Ericsson has been committed with reverent expressions of the national gratitude to the keeping of his native country, the Government of the United States, saved from infinite peril by his genius, shall, for the sake of a few dollars, make this sign of contempt for the dignity of Norway and Sweden. These Scandinavian nations will have a right to resent it. And their countrymen here, whose loyalty to our flag does not keep out of their hearts a filial affection for the old home and the folks beyond the seas, will not be slow to understand this unnecessary affront to the countries in which their kindred live, and in whose quiet churchyards their fathers lie buried.

Mr. DINGLEY obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last two words. I wish to call the attention of the committee, and especially of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], to the fact that this bill carries a less appropriation for the diplomatic service by at least half a million dollars than was appropriated in the year 1890. It is not true that in the appropriations made for our diplomatic service for the last fiscal year there was anything extravagant or uncalled for. The effort has been made to reduce the amount of appropriations with a view to economy.

Our appropriations for the diplomatic service, as I have remarked, have been decreasing since 1890 rather than increasing. For the fiscal year 1890 there was appropriated by the Fiftieth Congress, a Democratic Congress, the sum of $1,980,025, while the appropriation made at the second session of the Fifty-first Congress was only $1,656,925. This bill shows a reduction of only $72,000, and this reduction is attempted by methods which, as already suggested, can only bring this Government into discredit with foreign countries.

It seems to me that when we have reduced our appropriations $400,000 below those made for the fiscal year 1890 all ends of economy have certainly been subserved, and that it is a great mistake to endeavor in a diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, which has to do with our foreign relations, which has to do with the position we occupy toward foreign nations—a service which has always been regarded as above partisanship (for in all our foreign relations there has been an endeavor to maintain a high and honorable position)—it is a serious mistake to endeavor to cut down these appropriations a few thousand dollars when the price of such a measure must inevitably be the lowering of the position of this country in its relations toward such countries as Norway and Sweden and Denmark.

I hope that this Committee of the Whole and the majority of the House will not listen to the suggestions that have been made by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but will approve the amendment which has been presented, and continue the diplomatic service to Norway and Sweden and Denmark as it has stood for years. I trust that in a matter of this importance there will be no attempt to bring in those small considerations which, while out of place on any appropriation bill, are, it seems to me, singularly out of place on a diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, which has to do with the relations of this Government to foreign nations. I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, when I asked the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT] a little while ago to state the reason for reducing our representation to one minister for Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, he seemed to impute to my inquiry some ulterior motive of which I was entirely innocent. The question was asked purely for information and in entire good faith; and I feel somewhat relieved from the force of the imputation by the fact that four or five other gentlemen have since risen and borne testimony to their inability to discover in anything that has been said the reason for this action. So that I am not the only ignorant person among the multitude.

My interest in this matter, Mr. Chairman, has been largely based upon a very great degree of admiration which I have always entertained for the Scandinavian race. The people of the Scandinavian countries are certainly a class of persons whom we have every reason to welcome to our shores, and with whom we have every reason to desire to maintain the utmost cordiality of relations.

In my own State twenty-odd years ago, so high was the estimation in which our people held the populations of the Scandinavian peninsula that our Legislature authorized the creation of a special commission to visit Sweden and organize a colony for immigration to the State of Maine. Under the guidance of our present minister to Sweden a colony of its people came here and have established their homes in my section of the State of Maine, and, Mr. Chairman, without any exception whatever, I may say they have proved themselves to be among the most enterprising and industrious, as well as temperate, frugal, and desirable citizens who have made their home amongst us.

The traditions, temperament, and disposition of the Scandinavian people are such as to readily assimilate them with our people, and adapt them for a very excellent type of American citizenship. They are liberal in their ideas; they are of a kindly disposition; they have a very high degree of intelligence; they are remarkably industrious, and their reverence for the family tie is of a lofty character, so that if I were called upon to select from the peoples of the world those who more easily than any other would make the best type of republican citizens, I certainly should not hesitate in placing among the foremost the people of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. I trust, therefore, that this House will not for any paltry pecuniary consideration, or through the mere niggardly purpose of cutting down an appropriation bill, put a serious affront upon a people of that character.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will regard the pro forma amendment as withdrawn.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have but a single word to say. I have before me the State Department papers, and there is not a line of correspondence between these governments in the last year.

Mr. POST. What government?

Mr. BLOUNT. Between this country and Denmark. I admire the Scandinavian character just as much as any gentleman upon this floor, but when I find that diplomatic communications between the governments are so rare that there has not been one during the last year, I think there is but little occasion for continuing a minister in this country, and that the business can as well be done through the means of a combination such as that suggested by the committee. I do not believe there is any difficulty in making the combination of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, as proposed. But if the House sees fit to take a different course I shall be perfectly content to obey its behests, although I see no reason why this arrangement should not be made.

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The history of past legislation by this country is certainly a convincing proof to the minds of the majority of the people of the United States that there ought to be economy and fair and honest dealing on the part of the legislators with the moneys of the people. But as much as I appreciate the distinguished gentlemen who are here, and bent upon carrying into execution the principles of economy and reform, as much as I honor the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and other Democrats upon this floor who are disposed to stand up against these outrages and this tyrannical usurpation of power in imposing taxation upon the people, I am most heartily opposed to the adoption of this measure which would consolidate these countries in one diplomatic mission.

Mr. Chairman, the patriotic people of this Republic, North and South, will in due time weave a chaplet of honor and gratitude for the honest brow of the veteran statesman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whose services in this House for over a quarter of a century have, like the rocks of Gibraltar, imposed a barrier and protest to the wicked, surging billows of extravagance beating continuously against our nation's prosperity and happiness.

But, gentlemen, let me ask you, in behalf of the West, who are united on this subject, to stand by us and vote for this amendment. Let me tell the gentlemen from the South, as well as from the West, that your interests and our interests are identical; that we are brothers in the future as we are brothers now, and that we are bound together by a common tie.

We can not afford to ignore the interests of each other. Wisconsin, let me say to you gentlemen, is very happily united in favor of this amendment. Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, and all of the great Western States are in favor of declaring to our brother Scandinavians and Danes that we believe them to be citizens worthy of the respect and worthy of the citizenship which they have never yet dishonored. I do not propose to make a speech on this occasion. I only ask you gentlemen of the South to stand by the delegates from the West in support of a liberal policy towards as good a class of our citizens as the flag of our country has ever floated over. [Applause.]

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be a very inopportune time for this House to make the change proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the bill which is now pending. If I were to suggest the means of accomplishing some great economy, I should cut down our whole diplomatic service to that of mere chargé d'affaires, or first-class consuls. But recognizing so large a population as we have from the north of Europe in our country, constituting a large fraction of the West, and knowing them to be a most worthy and estimable people, I am decidedly opposed to the change suggested by the committee; and I hope that this House will not think me partial, but will permit me to thank the gentlemen who have paid my great-great-grandmother so many handsome compliments here to-day, and to hope that my motive in desiring to sustain the proposed amendment will not be misconstrued. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the manifest disposition of the House to continue this mission, I feel authorized in saying for myself and the committee that we will not press our opposition to the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST] will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, FOREIGN MISSIONS.

To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messengerservice, clerk hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate at Tangier, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of legations, and for printing in the Department of State, $105,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 12 and 13, page 6, by striking out the words "one hundred and five" and inserting "ninety" instead thereof.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, that is $5,000 only less than the bill of 1891. I find on examination of the contingent expenses of foreign missions in past years that in 1886 we expended $33,000, in 1887 $64,000, in 1888 $34,000, in 1889 $77,000, in 1890 $79,000, and it seems that this amount I propose is entirely reasonable.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, it has always been the policy of Congress to put in the hands of the Executive a sum that would meet an emergency, even to slightly overrun the probable expenditures, and this narrow margin has been kept by the committee as usual. I do not think we should now depart from our usual custom. All these contingent expenditures are determined with great particularity in the section, and no abuse has ever occurred, and there is no possibility of it. The language of the section is very specific and guarded. In connection with the gentleman who was Mr. Randall's able lieutenant [Mr. Burnes] years ago I helped to draw the section in the form in which it has been reported here. I think it ought to stand as the committee fixed it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The statement I have made, based on the data I have given, induces me, after a conference with several gentlemen of the committee, to offer this amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. BLOUNT was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS FOR LEGATION IN CHINA.

Rent of buildings for legation and other purposes at Peking, or such other place in China as shall be designated, $3,100.

Mr. HITT. I will offer an amendment to line 23, to strike out "three thousand one hundred" and insert "five thousand." I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the provision and the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. HITT:

"On page 6, line 23, strike out 'three thousand one hundred' and insert 'five thousand.'"

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the provision is for the rent of the legation at China. The act of March 3, 1875, authorized the payment of $5,000, and I ask the chairman's attention to that statute. Although it authorized $5,000, the Department or legation has been able to hire a building for $3,100. We provided for that amount in the bill last year. The building was insecure and incomplete, and in order to make it habitable and also to secure a fireproof building, the owners were induced to make extensive additions and repairs, and the contract was made that $1,900 more should be paid, as authorized by law. All this is set out more fully than I have stated it on page 290 and 300 of the estimates. The amendment that I suggested is simply to comply with the statute of 1875. And to carry out the contract which has been made by the State Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the committee have voted the full amount estimated for by the Department under the law. The Department have made their own estimate for the carrying out of the contract, such as they could make under the law and such as they had the right to estimate for. Then they come forward with what is known as a submission, which is something not authorized by law, but simply a suggestion. The committee have put in all that was estimated for and which the Department had any right to make an estimate for. I do not agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] in relation to this matter. There was an increase in the bill of last year of several hundred dollars by reason of improvements at this place. The contract that has been made has been made with the knowledge that there was no appropriation to justify it, and I trust that we shall leave it just as it has been for some time.

Mr. HITT. I will only remark in reply, Mr. Chairman, that the entry is made here by the Department in the tabulated estimates showing the $3,100 now paid, and they have put in a submission to Congress for the $1,900 further, but have added (page 300) that the contract has been made for $3,000 and made in pursuance of the law. It is all stated here, perfectly plain, in the volume of estimates. The statement of the gentleman from Georgia with reference to the figures in the column on page 88 is correct, but it should all be taken together, and then it is perfectly plain.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, there is no gentleman at all familiar with the mode of making estimates by the Departments who does not understand the difference between an estimate and a submission. An estimate is something authorized by law. A submission is something outside.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HITT, the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HITT) there were—ayes 28, noes 66.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCIES ARISING IN THE DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BLOUNT. I send up an amendment to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 9, page 8, by striking out the word "eighty" and inserting the word "sixty."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, before a vote is taken on that I would like to say that that sum was fixed by Mr. Bayard, then Secretary of State, and in that form has been continued. Every chairman who has prepared this bill knows and has been fully advised of the reason of it.

It can not take a dollar from the Treasury that every one of us does not want to have taken, as we know it will be in an emergency for the interest of the country. It may not take $10,000 in the whole year. It may require more. It is a matter of events. It is for a purpose that serves all of us, and I submit that the action of the very distinguished gentleman from whose suggestion this section and amount came [Mr. Bayard] was a wise one.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to call the attention of the committee to the amounts that have been expended under this item. In 1885 there was expended $15,000; in 1886, $18,000; in 1887, $17,000; in 1888, $25,000; in 1889, $12,000; in 1890, $29,000; in 1891, $41,000.

Now, we have by this proposition nearly $20,000 more than has been expended under this item from 1885 on. Recently a part of this fund has been used in relation to the settlement of our troubles with Italy.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much?

Mr. BLOUNT. Twenty-four thousand five hundred dollars. I do not believe that this fund ought to be used in that way. I believe that in any question relating to a settlement like this with a foreign power it is perfectly proper that the subject should have come under review in the House of Representatives. I wish to say in all frankness that so far as the settlement itself is concerned I have no doubt the Administration made a wise settlement; but I do not propose to leave this fund in this shape in a matter where we might differ with the Administration. I do not understand that this fund was designed for such a purpose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question? How much was expended last year?

Mr. BLOUNT. Last year there was expended $41,000; the year before that, $29,000; the year before that, $25,000; and the year before that, $17,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Now it is $65,000?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Does not that still leave more than enough for just such a situation as the gentleman from Georgia has spoken of?

Mr. BLOUNT. I think there ought to be some liberality along this line, for there might be an emergency where we might desire to use it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This sum was $41,000 in the last bill.

Mr. MCCREARY. I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. I think the amount—$80,000 named in the bill—is too large, and while I supported that amount two or three times in previous appropriation bills, I am satisfied now that it is too much. I have no criticism to make upon the amount paid the Italian sufferers, but I believe when $25,000 is taken out of the Treasury to pay an indemnity or to compensate for an injury it ought to be done through the Congress of the United States. A few years ago, during the Administration of Mr. Cleveland, there was mob violence at Rock Springs, in Wyoming, in which Chinamen were killed or injured. When President Cleveland believed that Chinese subjects should be compensated for the losses and injuries sustained at Rock Springs he sent a special message to Congress urging an appropriation as an act of comity and friendship, and the Congress of the United States appropriated $145,000.

I think that was the proper way to dispose of that trouble; and I believe a proper disposition of this would have been for the President of the United States to have informed the Congress of the United States exactly of the situation, and asked for an appropriation of money.

Mr. BLOUNT. It was in session at that time.

Mr. MCCREARY. And, as suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, Congress was in session at the time the $25,000 was taken out of this emergency fund to be paid to the Italian sufferers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Kentucky, who is no doubt perfectly informed in this matter, inform the House what is the real purpose of giving this emergency fund? What is the nature of the general items which, in his judgment, would fairly come within this fund?

Mr. MCCREARY. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that this is called an emergency fund, and it is to meet emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service. There is no law directing how it shall be distributed or paid out. For some years the amount has not reached $40,000 per annum. Eighty thousand dollars is sought to be appropriated in the bill, and it is clear to my mind that $80,000 is too much.

Mr. BLOUNT. If my friend will allow me, I will state that $41,000 is the highest amount that this fund has reached within the last ten years.

Mr. MCCREARY. And as my friend says $41,000 is the highest amount that it has reached within the last ten years. It appears, therefore, that the amount, $80,000, named in the bill is not needed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. For what has it been spent?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move to strike out the last word. And I do so for the purpose of permitting the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. MCCREARY. I will state to the gentleman that the law does not require that a report shall be sent to Congress as to how this fund is used. It is in the nature of a secret-service fund; while books are kept in the State Department showing for what purpose it is paid out, I have never called upon the State Department for the items of the account.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I do not care so much about the items. What I desire is that we should have more general information; and I will yield my time to the gentleman to give that information.

Mr. MCCREARY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that it is a secret-service fund, always controlled by the State Department, and only so much of it is expended as seems necessary and the residue is left in the Treasury. The accounting officers are not required to examine into the details as to how it is paid, but it is placed at the disposal of the President, and necessarily these items are secret. My friend could get the information from the State Department.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I do not want to get the particular items, but I wanted to get at some information as to how you fix the sum required.

Mr. BLOUNT. Some of the amount is used for presents. If Congress were to make the appropriation of $80,000, only sufficient of that amount is taken out to meet the demands on that fund, not to exceed that sum.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Now, will either one of the gentlemen tell the House what was the settlement made with the Italian Government, and upon what principle does that come within the secret-service fund?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not tell my friend; I do not see how it should, and for that reason I have thought possibly that it ought not to be made.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Can my distinguished friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who has been in the diplomatic service, tell us?

Mr. MCCREARY. I will have read, if the gentleman will allow me, a statement signed by Hon. James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, which will probably throw light upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield? Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Yes, sir; I took the floor simply for the purpose of getting information.

Mr. MCCREARY. I will send up to the Clerk's desk, and have read, the statement of the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 12, 1892.

SIR: I congratulate you that the difficulty existing between the United States and Italy, growing out of the lamentable massacre at New Orleans in March of last year, is about to be terminated. The President, feeling that for such an injury there should be ample indemnity, instructs me to tender you 125,000 francs. The Italian Government will distribute this sum among the families of the victims.

While the injury was not inflicted directly by the United States, the President nevertheless feels that it is the solemn duty, as well as the great pleasure, of the National Government to pay a satisfactory indemnity. Moreover, the President's instructions carry with them the hope that the transaction of to-day may efface all memory of the unhappy tragedy; that the old and friendly relations of the United States and Italy may be restored, and that nothing untoward may ever again occur to disturb their harmonious friendship.

I avail myself of this occasion to assure you that your prolonged service at this capital as chargé d'affaires has been marked by every quality that renders you grateful and acceptable to the Government of the United States, and to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Marquis IMPERIALI.

Chargé d'affaires of Italy.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the response of the Marquis Imperiali, chargé d'affaires, representing Italy in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCCREARY. If the gentleman desires to hear this response read, I will have it read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY. I will have it read in my own time.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1892.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: You were pleased to inform me, by your note of to-day, that the Federal Government had decided to pay to Italy, by way of indemnity, the sum of 125,000 francs, to be distributed by the Italian Government among the families of the royal subjects who were victims of the massacre which took place March 14, 1891, in the city of New Orleans. Your excellency also expressed the hope that the decision reached by the President would put an end to the unfortunate incident to which the deplorable occurrence gave rise, and that the friendly relations between the two countries would be firmly established.

After having taken note, with much pleasure, of the language used by the President in his message of December last, and after having fully appreciated the words of regret and censure uttered with so much authority by the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, and likewise the recommendations to Congress that were suggested to his lofty wisdom by the unhappy incident, the Government of His Majesty is now glad to learn that the United States acknowledge that it is their solemn duty, and at the same time a great pleasure, to pay an indemnity to Italy.

The King's Government does not hesitate to accept this indemnity without prejudice to the judicial steps which it may be proper for the parties to take, and, considering the redress obtained sufficient, it sees no reason why the relations between the two Governments, which relations should faithfully reflect the sentiments of reciprocal esteem and sympathy that animate the two nations, should not again become intimate, cordial, and friendly, as they have traditionally been in the past, and as it is to be hoped they will ever be in the future.

In bringing the foregoing to your knowledge, in virtue of the authorization given me by his excellency, the Marquis di Rudini, president of the council, minister of foreign affairs, in the name of the Government of His Majesty the King of Italy, my august sovereign, I have the honor to declare to your excellency that the diplomatic relations between Italy and the United States are from this moment fully reestablished.

I hasten, moreover, in obedience to instructions received, to inform you that, pending the minister's return to this capital, I have taken charge of the royal legation in the capacity of chargé d'affaires.

Be pleased to accept, etc.,

IMPERIALI.

His Excellency JAMES G. BLAINE.

Secretary of State, etc.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. If I gather the substance of that correspondence, I understand that the President of the United States, without the approval of the Senate, without any communication with either branch of Congress or to Congress, has settled the difficulty with Italy, and established a precedent that the United States admits its liability for an act alleged to be lawless committed upon a citizen of a foreign government within one of the States, and for an act not adjudged to be a crime by the tribunals of the State it makes the United States responsible to the country of which the person was a subject.

Now, it seems to me that, without speaking as to whether this precise settlement was wise or not, we ought not to allow such a precedent to be made without putting upon record our protest that we do not believe that under our form of government the President of the United States has power to make the Government of the United States responsible under such circumstances; that it is far more important in the principle that is established by this than the sum of money paid. In the second place, saying it with great respect, the emergency fund given to the President of the United States in the general nature of a secret-service fund is not such a fund as should be treasured upon in such a settlement; that this does not in any real sense of the word constitute an emergency arising in the diplomatic and consular service, nor does it come within the general nature of a secret service, but it is simply a diplomatic difficulty to be settled through the ordinary diplomatic officers of the Government by negotiation, and if a treaty is required to be considered and ratified by the Senate.

In both aspects of the matter, without regard to the question whether the settlement is a fair settlement, the mode of that settlement is contrary to the nature of our form of government and our peculiar institutions. I do not mean to criticize the amount of money involved in the settlement; about that I know nothing; it may be a proper sum. Nor do I mean to say that the Government of the United States, under the circumstances, is not responsible. What I submit is that the President under our form of government has not the power to make the United States responsible under such circumstances, and that in his action, if sanctioned, we have a precedent which from this time forward destroys internationally our peculiar form of government as a government of States forming a national union.

Mr. SIMPSON. Besides, the President has assumed the functions of the Senate and of Congress.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this whole question took place with great fullness a year ago, and is to be found in the published document of the correspondence in relation to the killing of persons at New Orleans on March 14, 1891. The whole questions of international right and law were then gone over and the position of our Government was stated with clearness. It will be recollected that at that time the Italian Government made a very energetic protest and demand for reparation and punishment of the murderers, with intimation that the Italian minister would be withdrawn if this were not at once done; and in fact the minister immediately left. The reply of Secretary Blaine sent to Marquis Imperiali April 1, 1891, states with precision and dignity the position of the United States, and adds:

I have repeatedly given to Baron Fava the assurance that, under the direction of the President, all the incidents connected with the unhappy tragedy at New Orleans on the 14th of March last should be most thoroughly investigated. I have also informed him that in a matter of such gravity the Government of the United States would not permit itself to be unduly hurried.

You will remember, gentlemen, the approving response which the country gave to those words when that imperious and impatient demand was made by the Marquis Rudini.

Nor will it make answer to any demand until every fact essential to a correct judgment shall have been fully ascertained through legal authority. The impatience of the aggrieved may be natural, but its indulgence does not always secure the most substantial justice.

The Marquis Rudini then said he meant to ask prompt judicial proceedings when he had had said punishment.

The Marquis Rudini—

Says the Secretary of State, in his reply of April 14, 1891—may be assured that the United States would recompense every Italian subject who might "be wronged by the violation of a treaty" to which the faith of the United States is pledged. But this assurance leaves unsettled the important question whether the treaty has been violated.

He recalls the conclusions maintained by Mr. Webster in 1851, then Secretary of State, in the case of mob violence in this same city of New Orleans, when the feeling against the Spanish led to an outbreak; and he points out the difference in our Federal system between the authority and responsibility in the first instance of the State and State authorities and the Federal Government, and the limitations on the authority and responsibility of the Federal Government.

The President directed the Attorney-General to cause full inquiry to be made whether the case was for the State or Federal authorities, and treated with respectful discussion the demands of the Italian Government. So the investigation proceeded. A year passed. The investigation with the care and deliberation due to a question involving important international relations took place. At last, after reports from the officers who were charged with the inquiry into the facts, the claim of the Government of Italy that, of the eleven men killed, the larger part were subjects of the Italian Government, was much reduced; in fact, nationality or naturalization appeared uncertain as to several of the men killed, though several were undoubtedly Italian subjects.

In the communications which, as the gentleman from Kentucky knows well, are usually oral between negotiators under these circumstances, a point was reached where it was found by the Secretary of State that the whole matter in controversy between the two countries could be settled immediately by paying right then a sum, which amounts to less even than the lives of the subjects of Italy who had been killed, as it appeared by the reports, in disregard of law and treaty, would have been accounted by the State laws in the matter of damages in cases of persons losing their lives by railroad accidents, $5,000 each. Then, as that "emergency" had come when, without a single word of further discussion, by the payment of this little sum of $25,000, the two nations could be put instantly at peace and the whole question disposed of—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended. This is an important matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois. We shall probably get into confusion if we do not adhere to the rule.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this was clearly a moment which might readily be defined as an "emergency," when, by a small payment of money, the amount of which the gentleman from Kentucky has shown he appreciates was not the important point, a great end could be instantly attained—when the payment gracefully and promptly of this little sum would readjust the relations of the two nations—a moment, too, when those relations were peculiarly important, the Italian Government having been chosen one of the arbiters in a great question of high importance to us; and when we were earnestly and ineffectively soliciting the participation of the Italian people and Government in our international fête at Chicago. These substantial facts made this what I think anyone must recognize as an "emergency"—just what was anticipated by the law appropriating $80,000 to meet unforeseen emergencies.

Mr. MCCREARY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether Congress was not in session at the time and whether the President could not by a message have asked Congress to appropriate $25,000?

Mr. HITT. The gentleman's question, of course, is not intended to be answered yes or no, for everybody knows that Congress was in session. The question of the gentleman substantially is, why was not the matter communicated to Congress? The reason is, and I thought I had stated it by implication, that the force of the act lay in doing it at once, and so it was an emergency. Sending a communication to Congress would of course have involved delay and public discussion, perhaps long discussion and delay, and apparent haggling in dealing with this great question which could be amicably and conclusively arranged for this petty sum in a day, might have averted or defeated the end in view, a prompt and cordial restoration of amicable relations.

Under other governments having parliaments of far more peremptory powers than the Congress of the United States—in Great Britain, for example—it is deemed best not to give publicity to steps concerning international interests when Parliament and public officers and the people are satisfied that those charged with public duties are earnestly and faithfully discharging them to the best of their ability, and that publicity could not forward the matter. We have a similar opinion of our Executive, and like trust in the loyal zeal and skill and patriotism with which duty will be met in "emergencies"; and I am sure no member of Congress would want to elicit or provoke a discussion which would detract from the force our ministers should exert in a negotiation of this kind or impair in any way the likelihood of complete success.

Mr. McMILLIN. The question I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois, with his permission, is, what authority of law the President of the United States has, or the Secretary of State, to adjudicate the liabilities of the Government of the United States, or to assume that the Government was liable and undertake to make a settlement? Under what law has he the power to do that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, permit me to say a single word further on this subject. As to the former correspondence of the Secretary of State upon this question I have no criticism to make. The spirit exhibited was proper, and I indorsed it, and also indorsed that part of the correspondence which called the attention of foreign governments to the relation of the United States, under our particular form of government, to the States, and refused to admit that the Government was liable for indemnity without judicial proceedings had according to law in the State where the alleged wrong was committed.

The President of the United States also thought fit to submit to Congress a very weighty recommendation that Congress should provide by statute for just such cases under the constitutional provision which makes treaties, together with the laws of Congress, the supreme law of the land. This Congress has not seen fit to do this.

Now the President—and that is the point that I desire to emphasize—the President, after having remitted the question to Congress, undertakes to settle it by a payment out of a fund appro-appropriated for other purposes; and thereby also settles for the country, first, the precedent that the Government of the United States is liable without judicial inquiry in the given State where the alleged crime is committed for an act which was done against the citizen of a foreign government. Second, that the President, as President, without the intervention of the Senate or of Congress, has the power to adjudicate and settle these diplomatic difficulties and adjudicate and pay claims that may arise under such circumstances without a distinct appropriation for that purpose; and third, that a particular fund given him for one purpose can be used for another and an entirely different purpose, not contemplated when the appropriation was made.

Now, it seems to me that, without any special criticism as to the particular settlement, Congress ought simply to say, however in this matter the settlement on pecuniary grounds may have been a good settlement or on international grounds however kindly and generous the sentiment may have been, it is not an act which, unwarranted as it was, we can indorse and approve.

I thought it not improper to say this much while this section is under consideration.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of expressing my hearty concurrence in the sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. I do not propose to criticize the amount paid to the Italian Government by way of settlement. Whether that was correct or not, or whether it was or was not a good settlement from a mere economic view, is not the material question here. What I want to criticize is the fact that the President of the United States undertakes for the first time in our history to adjudicate, single-handed and alone, the amount that shall be due to a foreign nation for an injury committed upon one of its subjects on our territory, and to make a settlement and pay such claim out of a fund that was never appropriated to be used in that way. Congress was in session; why not lay the matter before them? Why should he assume to be sole judge of whether or not the demand was one for which the Federal Government was liable? Why should he assume to determine how much was due?

There was no contemplation that this fund would ever be diverted to any such use as that, and, furthermore, if it had been known that it was to be so diverted, Congress, while it might have made a settlement like this if it saw fit to do so, and may have paid the same sum or a larger sum if it thought proper, would still have reserved to itself the right to make the settlement. The President has no right in the premises except that which comes from appropriating money that is in his hands for specific purposes. Why not call on Congress for authority?

I know my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has said that an emergency had arisen. If "the emergency" is so great that the Congress of the United States can not take hold of it, certainly the President ought not to presume to do so.

A MEMBER. Was it not a good settlement?

Mr. McMILLIN. It may have been a very economical settlement; it is certainly one that assures peace, and that is something greatly to be desired. But there are things in a republican system and in free government that are more desirable than either economy or peace, and one is adherence to the forms of constitutional government.

We have a President already exercising the right to impose taxes without convening Congress if not here, or consulting Congress if here. Now, we have a President assuming to take a fund that was never expected to be used in the way it was used, and making a settlement, and also, so far as one man can commit the Government to it, placing us in the position that if a riot or a mob in the States occurs, the Government of the United States is liable to foreign governments for injury inflicted upon their citizens.

If the President may impose taxes without Congress, as he does under the last tariff law, and then spend it without consulting Congress, as he has done in this instance, why not abolish Congress? That, I hold, was a question for Congress, not the President. I thought it proper to say this much, Mr. Chairman, in that spirit of candor which I think should characterize the men who represent the interests of a great people on this floor.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Before my colleague takes his seat will he allow a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. In the payment of this money by the President, does it not necessarily decide the question that liability did attach to the Government of the United States?

Mr. McMILLIN. Of course, and commits the Government to that idea so far as one man going beyond what he was expected to do could commit it. But what I want to say is, that it is for Congress alone to determine this in the future, and no man born of woman can undertake to determine what is the liability of this Government in such a case.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Another question with the gentleman's consent. Did the honorable Secretary of State announce in that discussion which passed between the two governments that these citizens had the same legal rights that citizens of the United States would have in the courts and nothing more?

Mr. McMILLIN. I so remember. If he did not announce that, he did not announce the whole case, for that certainly is the case.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what communication the committee or the House have had with the President with relation to the payment of that $25,000. Do I understand that this $30,000 is inserted in this bill with a view to providing for that $25,000?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all, Mr. Chairman. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill always contains an item "emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service." Now, these appropriations carried by this bill are not available until the 30th of June, and therefore have no application at all to this matter. There was a bill passed by the last Congress providing for this current fiscal year, and in that there was contained a fund of $80,000, and the President, or the Secretary of State, and I presume both, finding that this fund was large, and that they might avail themselves of it, did use it for the purpose of making the payment and the money is actually paid.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Then this proposed appropriation has nothing to do with the $25,000?

Mr. BLOUNT. Nothing whatever.

Mr. BUSHNELL. As that is already paid?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; and I think it very proper to cut this item down, because the largeness of it seems to tempt to a very liberal construction.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was there ever in contemplation, when that appropriation was passed out of which this payment was made, that it would be so used?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not conceive that anybody contemplated its being used for any such purpose.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I agree with the gentleman that we ought to begin to cut off the supplies, if they are being improperly used.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object to that payment?

Mr. McMILLIN. I criticize the President of the United States for assuming to make it. I do not criticize the amount, for that is the main question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do you think it would have been better for Italy to have collected the indemnity from the State of Louisiana?

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it would have been better to go at it in a legal way, and not for the President of the United States or the Secretary of State to assume to adjudicate a question that is clearly outside of their functions.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Perhaps they did not take that view of it.

Mr. MCCREARY. I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]. He wanted to know of the gentleman from Tennessee if he thought this amount ought not to have been paid, or whether the State of Louisiana ought to have paid it. You will find that when the officer representing Italy accepted $25,000 he accepted it upon the condition that—

The King's Government does not hesitate to accept this indemnity without prejudice to the judicial steps it may be proper for the parties to take.

So that although the $25,000 has been paid, it has been accepted under such conditions as to leave the parties who have been damaged with judicial rights, the same as they had before.

Mr. McMILLIN. And recognizing, so far as the President could, our liability.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], of course, draws the very palpable distinction between the adjustment of an international controversy between the United States and Italy, and the pendency of any claim or litigation that there may be between citizens or residents of a State of the American Union, under the laws of the State.

Mr. MCCREARY. But I understood you to intimate that this would be in full to the parties that were damaged.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to say further to the gentleman from Kentucky that my inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] was not based upon any idea of suggesting the propriety of Italy claiming any indemnity from the State of Louisiana. It was based upon this: That during that controversy, when these people who had been tried and acquitted in a court in the State of Louisiana, and were in the sanctuary of the jail, were assassinated, and the Italian Government called upon the United States to answer for that treatment of men alleged at that time to be Italian subjects, the question arose whether the United States were responsible as a nation for what occurred in a State; in other words, whether we had that sort of nationality that enabled us to answer to a foreign government for the fulfillment of our treaty obligations; and I recollect reading at that time in some New York paper a telegram which seemed to me to strike at the meat of the controversy, in which one of the members of the foreign office in Italy, I think the assistant foreign minister, in discussing this question in reply to the suggestion that under our Constitution the Government of the United States had no power to make reparation for any injury inflicted upon a foreign citizen within the territory of a State, he said, "Very well, if your Constitution will not permit you to carry out your treaty obligations, you had better either reform your Constitution or abrogate your treaties;" and he further said: "If the Government of Italy, when it is aggrieved by an outrage or injustice to its citizens, is debarred from seeking reparation from the Government of the United States, why then we will have to recognize the sovereignty that is responsible, and make war upon the State, or take measures for a declaration of hostilities towards the community." He said: "We can not understand how you make treaties that guarantee to our people protection and safeguards similar to those which we guarantee to your citizens here, and then, when they are murdered or otherwise injured or outraged, how can you take refuge in a Constitution under which you say the Government has no power to exercise its protection over a foreign citizen, or to extend the axis of its treaty obligations within the limits of a State."

Mr. McMILLIN. But right there my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] will observe that the very point of shielding the State or citizen from any liability has not been guarded by the President, as I understand.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the gentleman examines that case a little more closely he will find—

Mr. McMILLIN. The receipt which was given was a very peculiar one.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think you will find that the attitude of the Italian Government to-day is this: That they have accepted from the United States Government this indemnity as entirely discharging the obligation of the United States for whatever onus may have rested upon us as a nation, but that it is not to be regarded as prejudicing any right that may arise in the State of Louisiana or under the laws of that State or under the laws of the United States, as affecting what had transpired within that territory. It seems to me the distinction is very clear.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST] unless he yields.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. The question I want to ask the gentleman is this: If the liability attaches to the United States on account of that affair, it must attach by virtue of a treaty. Is that not so? Now, is it not a fact that the treaty only stipulated that the protection to be granted to the citizens of Italy should be the same as is granted to the citizens of the State of Louisiana?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is true.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Now, then, suppose a mob had assassinated a citizen of the State of Louisiana? Upon what principle do you make the Government responsible for that?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The answer to that is that the Government of the United States undertook to extend to the subjects of the King of Italy sojourning in this country the same kind of protection that it extends to the citizens of the States.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. The courts are open to them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, well, if the gentleman desires to place himself upon the broad ground that a citizen of a foreign country or a citizen of the United States who has been subjected to the arbitrament of the laws of a State of the Union, and under those laws has been acquitted of an offense, or declared innocent of the crime, that such men are men held under the safeguard of the laws of the State can be assassinated, and yet that the Government of the United States has neither power to offer reparation to a foreign government or to provide reparation to one of its own citizens, he minimizes the power of this Government to a degree that I can hardly contemplate.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Pardon me, in reply, for stating that the "gentleman" has no desire of that kind, but when the plain treaty stipulation is that a foreigner shall have the right to sue in our courts just as a citizen has the right to sue, "he" sees no reason why a privilege should be granted to a foreigner which is not extended to a citizen of the United States.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is the purpose of the United States to extend the same guarantees to the citizens of all countries as it requires for her own citizens who happen to be in other countries, and it guarantees what we surely would demand for our own citizens from the strongest nation on the globe.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how the question that is now being discussed is properly before the House. The fund from which this money was taken, if it was taken from the fund under discussion, was positively put at the disposal of the President to serve the best interests of the Government. It was in the Mexican war, I think, that a lieutenant commanding a sloop of war was sent around to reconnoiter a Mexican port of which the admiral desired to take possession. He was to go there and wait until the admiral could bring his fleet around to capture the port.

The sloop of war coming suddenly on this port found the defenders in confusion, and, without hesitation or waiting for the admiral, took possession of the port and accomplished the object of the expedition. Although I believe, as a matter of fact, the lieutenant was court-martialed for disobedience of orders, yet, at the same time, the country applauded the pluck with which he did it, and it always will applaud an executive who is wise and successful, an officer who takes advantage of those circumstances which insure success.

The President of the United States is charged with the duty of protecting the foreign interests of the United States. He must act promptly and wisely, taking advantage of every opportunity to prevent international difficulty. If he fails to do that, if he fails to use the means placed at his disposal when it is plainly for the interest of the nation to do so, he would be justly condemned. He will not be when he averts international difficulty by the prompt use of the means placed at his disposal for emergencies in our foreign relations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this proposition is to retrench from an appropriation which is never used in full, from an appropriation that is notoriously larger and must necessarily be larger than it is expected to be used.

I confess that I think the appropriation recommended by Mr. Bayard when he was Secretary of State, and which has always been continued, might be wisely continued by this Congress.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, a great deal of the debate has been in the form of questions, I supposed some of it more for the purpose of expressing implied opinions than of eliciting answers. But the subject of the liability and obligation of the Government in these international cases has been set forth so often and fully in the volumes of diplomatic correspondence that have been printed that I will not weary the House by reading or citing them. Mr. Webster stated the rule in the first New Orleans case, the Spanish case, and Mr. Blaine restated it in his dispatch to the Italian minister, April 14, 1891. Our Government is not liable for lives or property of foreigners lost where it is not by act of the Government or its officers, but a mob, unless the public authorities connived at the destruction or neglected to prevent it; nor in this case, unless Italian subjects in New Orleans, peaceful and law abiding, suffered by the neglect of public officers to do their duty or connived at the violence, and failed afterwards to take steps to bring the guilty to trial.

If a treaty guarantees protection to citizens and subjects of another country, it has always been recognized as a matter which the other country may fairly complain of when such violence and destruction occur, and ask for an explanation and a rectification, or indemnity; and we have accorded it in past instances. We have done it by acts of Congress, we have done it by acts of the Executive. When a favorable opportunity arose to dispose of such a complaint, which had brought grave consequences, and do it at once, by a small payment made in a satisfactory manner and promptly, it was an emergency and a time to follow the precedents. We do this without directly admitting the legality of the claim. When Chinamen were murdered by hundreds in a Territory in disregard of the authority of law, or in the absence of the officers of justice, we paid them an indemnity for losses to the families in large sums of money, but said it was from a sentiment of humanity—not strictly admitting it to be a legally binding claim.

Again, there was the Spanish case. Here was a case which was exceedingly grave as to consequences threatened, because the attending circumstances were such as to lead to almost rupture—the withdrawal of the Italian minister from Washington, the withdrawal of our minister from Rome, and a check to the intercourse between two great governments and nations that had been cordial and friendly. That became a very grave question, which menaced vast interests of many kinds. A moment arose when the settlement could be made quickly and easily. No admission was made of any dangerous rule. In Secretary Blaine's dispatch of April 14, 1891, he states the position of the United States in his dispatch to Imperiali, where he says: "No foreigner shall ever be in a better position in this country than an American citizen."

The courts are open to the American citizen. After all that had been considered, and after investigating the condition at New Orleans, the violence done, and such evidence as the Italian minister presented of who were the sufferers, the moment seemed to arise exactly described by the word "emergency" placed in this law. It was found in consultations with the representative of Italy, the chargé d'affaires who was temporarily filling the post, to prevent nonintercourse, that there could be an easy adjustment, and it was wisely seized as an emergency, and the money paid, but not to meet a claim under a rule of law.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to say that if the word "emergency" is to be construed to give the President such power as has been assumed in this case I should be in favor of striking out every cent of this emergency appropriation.

A MEMBER. Why?

Mr. McMILLIN. Because I do not wish this power conferred on the President. It does not belong to him under the Constitution; he ought not of right to have it; and if this appropriation of an emergency fund is construed by him and those under him to carry with it the authorization of such action on his part I would strike out the whole emergency fund.

Mr. MCCREARY. I do not think it would be well to strike out the entire fund.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am only stating what I would do if that is to be the construction.

Mr. MCCREARY. There are certain emergencies in which the President ought to have money to use as an emergency fund.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BLOUNT, it was agreed to.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid to any foreign power in settlement of any claim of such power against the United States."

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Chairman, the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] in defense of the payment in the case of Italy would establish a power on the part of the President to settle any difficulty, to make any apology, and to dispose of any amount of the public money, unless he be limited by the amount of the appropriation for emergencies, for that appropriation must be the source of his power if he possess it at all. Without desiring to be censorious, it occurs to me that the action of the President in this case presents a very serious question.

If his conduct in this instance was constitutional, then he alone, without the aid of the Senate, and in defiance, it may be, of the House, can determine what attitude we shall take in regard to any foreign difficulty. He may make an apology to a foreign nation for conduct on our part, conduct which Congress, the war-making power, might be unwilling to apologize for—which, on the contrary, it might be willing to go to war rather than apologize for. This is simply a practical assertion by the Executive of the power to apologize or to pay such sums of money or to make such terms with a foreign nation as may seem to him to be prudent and proper.

Now, I am not assailing the amount involved in this settlement, nor the propriety of an indemnity of some amount; nobody assails either, but the important question is the principle involved. If we do not in some way demur to that principle, if we do not by some action in connection with the pending appropriation of an emergency fund now to be granted enter a protest, this Italian case is a precedent, and we in substance declare that to the exact limits of any emergency fund which we may vote the President may apologize, may make terms or concessions, may give rights or assume obligations without any check whatever either from the Senate or the House, and without any consultation with anybody. Nay, more, it is a practical announcement to the world that the President has a general, unrestricted power in this respect.

Mr. DINGLEY. Would your amendment change what you described as a possibility on the part of the President? He might "apologize," after your amendment had been adopted.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman is asking what he thinks is a very cute question. He understands the object of the amendment just as well as I do. It prohibits a use of the emergency fund for the settlement of foreign claims.

Mr. DINGLEY. But your argument proceeds beyond the amendment.

Mr. CHIPMAN. My argument proceeds clear beyond it, and yet has not half embraced the case. We have been very temperate. We have not assailed or denounced this usurpation of power in the manner in which it should be assailed and denounced. I simply propose that this emergency fund shall not be diverted from its proper purpose; that is the object of my amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will not the gentleman state his view as to the purpose of this emergency fund?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Suppose the President wishes to send a confidential messenger abroad; that would be one object; there are other objects which the gentleman can imagine as well as I can.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It seems to me that is clearly within the purview of the appropriation.

Mr. CHIPMAN. There I differ entirely with the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The precedents show that it has been so regarded.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I know of no such precedents. This is a matter which involves the power of this House, as in the Chinese matter. In that matter Mr. Cleveland came to us. Now, as I understand, the President does not recognize our liability to pay an indemnity; he has adopted this course as a mere act of comity. How can he, standing by himself, be generous with the public treasure of the country? We are the representatives of the people in that regard.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should say he could do so, because Congress has given him the power, within that very limited circumscription—the amount of the fund.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMILLIN obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. CHIPMAN.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman from Maine says the President can do this because we have given him this very power in this emergency appropriation. That is arguing in a circle; it is begging the question. We must go to the Constitution, not to the emergency fund, to find out what the President's power is. The argument of the gentleman is simply that it is because it is.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But my friend seems to fall into the error of supposing that nobody else ever went to the Constitution until he arose upon this particular occasion.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, no doubt the gentleman thinks that an exceedingly clever remark, though it is not so happy as some of his efforts at wit on this floor. I have known him to be quite witty. I suppose that I, humble as I am, may go to the Constitution with as much facility as the gentleman goes to the emergency fund, and the Constitution happens to be the standard.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman understands, I hope, that I meant no discourtesy. I merely wanted to suggest that the appropriation of this emergency fund year after year has presumably been based upon the conviction of Congress that such action as this on the part of the President was within the purview of the Constitution.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman misunderstands me entirely, or he misinterprets me: misrepresents me. What I say is that the emergency fund was not for the purpose of settling disputes with foreign nations, or to pay indemnities, nor was it a fund provided for the purpose of enabling the President to indulge his personal ideas of generosity. That is all I intend. I say that if there is generosity to be indulged in here is the place.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What, in this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. If there is any claim to be settled, here is the place to settle it. If there is an apology to be made, here is the place to direct it to be made. And if, above all, another precedent is to be set, to govern our relations with foreign nations, here is the place to authorize it. Our relations, composed as we are of a dual government, are very complex; and how far we are responsible for what occurs in the States is a question of very serious importance. Foreign nations must take notice of our form of government. We are not a barbarous nation. We are not like Dahomey, or other nations of that sort, whose form of government is barbarous; or even, I might say, like that of the unspeakable Turk. We are a nation whose Constitution is known to the powers of the world; whose form of government is local and general. Civilized states exert pressure, force, to bring to civilized comity barbarous people and make their relations what they ought to be to the family of nations, regardless of their polity, and compel them to adopt another polity.

My contention is, Mr. Chairman, that it is not for the President to commit us in a matter of this kind, but for us to maintain here our dignity as a civilized nation—to set our own precedents, and to insist that the peculiarities of our Government shall not only be recognized, but shall be respected by all the nations of the earth with whom we have intercourse. In a word, I hold that if the treaty with a foreign government does not so express it, yet such treaty always carries that understanding, for without that understanding the dual form of government in this country would be utterly incompatible with any relations with those governments.

The President assumed a position here, and it has been properly said by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that position becomes a precedent, and it is not in his power to set a precedent of payment of public money without an act of Congress. If precedents are to be set, they must be set by the treaty-making power, or by Congress, exercising its functions under the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I want to say again that I do not care to continue this discussion about a matter that is not properly before the committee. But I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Michigan before he leaves the floor. This question is here now as I understand it merely because a newspaper report has been read at the desk. I am not aware of the truth of the facts it contains. It may be correct or it may not be correct.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. POST. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. I sent that article to the desk and had it read. It bears the signature of Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State.

Mr. POST. Do you recognize his signature?

Mr. McCREARY. It is a copy of a paper which he signed, which was obtained by the Washington Post, and it stands correct until the gentleman can assert that he knows it to be incorrect.

Mr. POST. Well, I do not assert that it is incorrect, for I do not know.

Mr. McCREARY. Do not you believe it is correct?

Mr. POST. It may be. I am not denying that. But I contend that it is not properly before us.

But I rose to ask a question of the gentleman from Michigan, who announces that the President might perhaps make an apology to a foreign nation for some injuries supposed to have been committed without the consent of Congress. I want to ask him distinctly where he supposes under our form of government, of which he speaks so eloquently, the authority rests to make an apology to a foreign nation. Where does that authority reside?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I think the authority to make it rests in the full body of Congress or in the treaty-making power.

Mr. POST. That the President can not—

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not believe that the President has power under the Constitution, and that it rests with the treaty-making power or with Congress.

Mr. POST. Can the gentleman state an instance where the President has sent in a message saying that there had been a wrong committed against a nation and he proposed to state to such foreign government that the Government of the United States was sorry the wrong had been committed. Can you state an instance of that kind?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I can not understand your question.

Mr. POST. I say does the gentleman know of an instance where the United States has apologized and regretted the action of one of its agents except those made by the Executive of the United States. Can you state a single instance in which it has been brought before Congress when such apology was about to be tendered?

Mr. CHIPMAN. The result of whatever has been done has been communicated to Congress for their action; but there are a great many things which have been done and are being done under our form of government of which I do not approve, of which I never did approve. I do not approve, for instance, of your tariff, your subsidies, nor of a hundred things which are being done all the time. I consider this to be one of the abuses, and if there are precedents for it, let us override the precedents at once; let us get rid of them. Let us stop it. Let us have no more such work.

Mr. POST. It is a very grave question with me whether there is anything about the Government that you do approve of. You are very much more swift to condemn than to approve.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman is entirely in error. He is a part of the Government, and so far I approve of him. He appears to behave himself very well indeed. [Laughter.]

Mr. POST. You disarm me.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Certainly, although I have not the floor.

Mr. POWERS. There is a point that I desire light upon.

A MEMBER. Move to strike out the last word.

Mr. POWERS. I will move to strike out the last letter of the last word.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman asks leave to strike out the last word in order that he may call me up and interrogate me. I wish to know if that is parliamentary? [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. I know the gentleman is an encyclopedia. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan whether in the past history of the country there have been any instances in which the President has had occasion to use and has used any of the emergency fund, so called, for a purpose similar to the Italian incident?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not know. Does the gentleman know of any?

Mr. POWERS. I inquired for information, because I did not know.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not believe there is a man on this floor who knows. I never heard of any such thing before.

Mr. POWERS. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if he has knowledge of any such thing?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not hear your question.

Mr. POWERS. I suppose we have had a statute similar to the one proposed in this bill, creating an emergency fund, for many years.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, for some time.

Mr. POWERS. That has been on the statute book a great many years.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Now, in the past history of our Government have any of our Presidents had occasion to draw upon that fund for the purpose of paying an indemnity for transactions similar to the Italian incident?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not that I know of. I wish to say, however, in all frankness, that the use of this fund is not to be found set out in the reports, because it is usually paid out on a warrant from the President, and is not intended to be known to the public, and I have not sought to go into it for the purpose of ascertaining.

Mr. POST. That payment does not commit the Government in any way.

Mr. POWERS. Is there any precedent in our past history for the payment of an indemnity without consulting Congress?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not that ever I heard of, but I do not claim to have gone into that secret account.

Mr. POST. It may have been done under the secret-service account.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I have no idea that it has been done.

Mr. HITT. I do not suppose the chairman of this committee, or any member of this House, or anyone who ever was a member of it, could answer that question. It is a part of the secret-service, and is in the discretion of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN].

The amendment was again reported.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division, there were—ayes 84, noes 42.

Mr. RAY. No quorum.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope gentleman will be content to exercise their right of taking a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this amendment.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. HITT. That right can be reserved.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not believe the committee are entirely clear as to what the effect of this amendment will be. Therefore I ask my friend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BLOUNT] if he will not permit this amendment to be passed over?

Mr. CHIPMAN. It is my amendment. The Chairman has no control over it.

Mr. BURROWS. I want to ask you [Mr. CHIPMAN] if you will not permit this amendment to be passed for the time being and take it up on Monday? I would like to look at it, and I think it would be better to do that.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I think I ought to insist on a vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to suggest to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] that this is a matter that seems to take a partisan turn, and gentlemen on the other side are opposed to it by reason of that fact, and are asking time to examine it. I think we would save time by letting it go over.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I had no idea there was any politics in this—not the least suspicion [laughter]; but as there seems to be, I will consent to the request of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The CHAIRMAN. Will the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT] submit his request?

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] may be passed over until the next sitting of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that this amendment may be passed over without prejudice until the next sitting of the committee? Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINENTAL RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Payment of the share of the United States of the expense of a preliminary survey for a continental railway as recommended by the International American Conference, to be available when the other nations mentioned by the International American Conference pay all their respective assessments, $65,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, on page 9, strike out the word "commission" and insert the word "survey."

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that involves the intercontinental survey; and I ask unanimous consent to pass over this section and the following until we have finished the remainder of the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia in his request. The paragraph about the "intercontinental railway" and the paragraph on the "international union of American republics" that he refers to are both of them very important, and I agree with him that it would be appropriate to pass them over, and take them up the next day the committee considers this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the request I made—to pass these two paragraphs over informally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks unanimous consent to pass over informally until the bill is completed the two paragraphs he has mentioned. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE B.

SALARIES, CONSULAR SERVICE.

Consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, Rio de Janeiro, and Liverpool, at $5,000 each, $25,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer an amendment to the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 10, strike out the words "and Liverpool," and also strike out the word "five" in line 8 of said section.

Mr. BLOUNT. This is simply a clerical error—a matter of arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITT. I purpose offering another amendment now. I move to amend by striking out of lines 6 and 7 the words "Havana" and "Rio de Janeiro" and insert between the lines 5 and 6 the words "consuls-general to Havana and Rio de Janeiro, $6,000 each, $12,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 10, line 5, insert: "Consuls-general to Havana and Rio de Janeiro, $6,000 each, $12,000."

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. HITT. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that my amendment is to strike out of lines 6 and 7 the words, "Havana and Rio de Janeiro," and insert between lines 5 and 6 the words "consuls-general to Havana and Rio de Janeiro, $6,000 each, $12,000."

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the object of the gentleman to be to strike out Rio de Janeiro and Havana from this paragraph and to make a paragraph above it for those two posts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any occasion for raising these places above $5,000 a year. I can see no reason for it. The business at Havana was $25,567, and at Rio it is only a little over $4,496; and $5,000 is the amount of fees he collects in the office, so that $5,000 is a very handsome salary, quite sufficient for a Senator or Representative in the Congress of the United States, and I have no doubt we could fill both those places for the amount fixed by this bill.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman is to cut down by this bill the salaries of the consul-general at Rio from $6,000 to $5,000, and to cut down the salary of the consul at Havana from $6,000 to $5,000. My amendment is to keep the law unchanged. The posts are both of great importance and the duties are the highest kind that are performed by any officers of the service. The gentleman again went back in the same old strain to measuring the office by the fees. Why, the consul-general at Havana is a man charged with a great deal of grave diplomatic duty, greater than the ministers at several of the courts elsewhere.

It is one of the places where grave questions concerning our international relations and questions of personal right and liberty arise more often than in Austria, Italy, or Russia, or several of the remote countries in the East. He is charged with the interests and the care of the persons of American seamen in vast numbers. The duties of the consul as an outpost of the Treasury are great, arising from the operations of our laws. This consul at Havana, in a country sometimes of arbitrary and irregular proceedings, is charged with a responsibility that is enormous. He is required to be a man familiar with Spanish law as well as with the Spanish language. It is an expensive and unhealthy place.

The consul at Havana is largely a diplomatic officer, and, I may say incidentally, but not to detain the House with details, that the present consul has addressed to the Department 1,550 dispatches, and the instructions sent to him, instead of being as they are in the ordinary business, run away into the hundreds—so multitudinous and so grave are the questions arising.

The fees last year were not so contemptible as the gentleman intimates. They were over $20,000—five times as much as the gentleman proposes to allow the officer. So that instead of its being a burden upon the Treasury he returns, even on the narrow proposition of the bill, a clear revenue to the Government of $15,000.

But that test is the most delusive of all things when you are dealing with this West India trade. An invoice from Cuba costing a fee of $2.50 very often covers $100,000 of value in cargo. During the year 1889—the last year for which I have a return at hand—the amount of the commerce coming out of Cuba was $36,277,849. This must all pass through the hands of the consul. There were more vessels bearing the American flag arriving at Havana and leaving it than perhaps at any other foreign port in the world. Out of the abundance of details concerning this matter I will give you one or two facts. Take the March return. During the quarter ending with March last there were 196 vessels; there were 5,687 seamen. These figures are but a meager indication of the business devolving upon the consul.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. HITT.

Mr. HITT. The consul has the care of those seamen; he has duties in connection with employing and discharging them and in sending home the effects of the dead. He uses his good offices, too, in the case of sailors in trouble; and this occurs very often with poor Jack, generally without any serious fault on his part. The custody of the ship's papers also falls upon this officer, and the protection of the number of American citizens there; and these are generally poor men—many of them are laboring men.

The time does not allow me to continue any extended discussion; but I have heretofore had occasion to examine this matter. From the great extent of the duties incumbent upon this officer the President frequently has difficulty in finding an able and suitable man as consul-general to Cuba when a vacancy occurs. More care, more peculiar forms of acquirement and ability are required than in the case of a minister at many diplomatic posts.

This officer receives no considerable compensation outside of his salary. The large amount of unofficial fees and perquisites received in European countries do not fall to this officer. Besides, he has to pay very heavily for the help employed in his office; and we never give him a sufficient allowance to cover it all. I do not know whether members are aware of the fact, but we do not allow these large consulates an allowance as clerk hire sufficient to pay for the actual expense. At London, for example, the consul-general pays $6,000 a year for clerk hire and we only allow him, I believe, $1,600. This officer is not paid too high.

The position at the Rio is very similar. The officer there has during the last few years been charged with the care of export trade to the United States of more than $50,000,000 per annum. Besides, he is charged with the protection of seamen in a port the most frequented on the whole eastern coast of that continent. His compensation is a very moderate one and it is wrong to reduce it. It is an injustice to the service and disturbs its efficiency. I have selected these two positions upon which to test the sense of the House. I think they ought to be left undisturbed.

One remark before I conclude. I find that at Rio Janeiro the notarial fees of the officer are $299.50. That is the extra pay going into this consul's pocket.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the irresistible tendency of my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] to exaggerate and magnify every point wherever there is a proposition in this bill to reduce expenditures. The gentleman's description of the scope of consular duties is not at all justified by the actual requirements of the service. There is no foundation for it in consular regulations or practice. The other day when I referred to the official fees as indicating the business at one of these places, the gentleman, with veritable scorn, declared that the business for which those fees are paid is but a very small part of the duties of the consul. He took us back five centuries and told us what consuls did then. Now, as an answer to the gentleman's exaggerated statement of the official duties of the consuls, I read from the Consular Regulations sent out by the Department for the guidance of the consuls themselves:

The duties of the consul are now for the most part commercial duties and have no representative character.

That is what the Secretary of State says: and yet my friend from Illinois in his argument has declared that the commercial business is a very insignificant part of the duties of the consul. Why, sir, an official of this class has no right to communicate with the government of the country where he is located; all such communications must go through our minister located there.

If the Consular Regulations are to be taken as authority then the official fees are the guide which an intelligent man should select for the purpose of arriving at just calculations in this matter. Any gentleman who will take up the Fifth Auditor's report and see what this consul is doing and then take the Consular Regulations as the criterion of what is required of him, must come to the conclusion that almost the exclusive business of the consul is looking after invoices, although there may be some other small items of business.

My friend has told us of the enormous business done by the consul at Havana. From his statement you would think that this officer is run to death in the matter of looking after seamen. On examining the report of the Fifth Auditor, I find that there were 20 seamen relieved during the year at this consulate; $40.74 was paid for board and lodging; $7.80 for clothing; $11.12 for medical attendance; and for other expenses $407, making a total of $467.

Then there are arrears of wages paid to the seamen $2,492, and this constitutes the whole of the work.

Now, I have shown you that this covers the case of twenty persons, the number of sailors relieved. As to wages and arrears collected, my friend talks of that amount as though it were a very large sum, and involves a great deal of work on the part of the consul. As a matter of fact the ship comes into port and the ship papers show the wages due to the seamen, and the consul has jurisdiction to compel payment. It is a simple matter and cannot possibly involve any considerable labor.

Again my friend talks of the matter as if this business was done by the consul himself, and that it was an onerous labor. Why, he has an allowance of $2,600 a year for clerk-hire.

Mr. HITT. And pays a good deal more.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Illinois says he pays a good deal more. Of the truth of that I have no knowledge. I do not see what he wants with a good deal more. This record of fees indicates that if he was any kind of a business man and did any work he would not want any more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCCREARY was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am very much obliged to my friend from Kentucky.

Now, we come to the consul at Rio de Janeiro—the consul-general there. He collects, according to this report, $4,496.50 in fees. My friend said the other day that that may represent millions of dollars in trade. Well, suppose it does. The “millions in trade” is not the matter that he is concerned about. He performs a certain duty. The merchant comes with his invoice and his declaration, and he is to place his certificate on it if he thinks the values are at all out of the way. Now, the products down there are not textiles, such as my friend spoke of some time ago. They are just that class of commodities which are easily investigated. The work is very simple, and the consul has nothing to do but to examine the invoice and sign the formal part of the papers. I venture the assertion that he can sign two hundred in a day. And further, I will venture the assertion, Mr. Chairman, that if he puts in honest day's work, in sixty days he would sign every invoice that comes from there.

Mr. MCCREARY. In the year?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, during the whole year. He has nothing else to do but that.

Again there has been much said in reference to our consular system and the reductions made here. I want the committee to understand, for I have not undertaken to debate it in general, as we go along among the various consuls we have found out what they are doing under their acquirements and under the consular regulations, and laws of the United States, and we have placed them in classes of $3,500, $3,000, and $2,500, according to the grades that always obtained. I say we have done this, and I think we have done it with care. There are some instances in which we have omitted to do it, but wherever we have done it any man who will take the special case and examine it thoroughly, and discover all the facts in relation to it, will admit that we could have done nothing else.

The gentleman talks of a consul having earned $20,000 and of our proposing to pay him but $5,000. He did not tell the number of consuls where they are not paying $100 though, and yet we are allowing them a compensation of $1,500. It is only by the careful adjustment of the whole system, on correct business principles, that any just classification or any proper conclusions can be reached. The fact of a consul having certified $20,000 of invoices does not entitle him to the $20,000. But as a matter of fact so far as the city of Rio is concerned, the consul there gets more than every dollar that he has collected from fees, and I think that as we go along item by item in the bill if gentlemen see fit to criticize it, and we challenge criticism all along the line, we can demonstrate the accuracy of our conclusions.

Mr. Chairman, I say that we challenge criticism because it is time that the country was understanding what this service really is. This foreign service is a good deal of a myth. The gentleman said it is because the people do not study it, and I agree to that. But I invite them to a study of it, and to the official papers in the Department itself. I invite gentlemen on the majority side of the House to go along with me and examine the official papers, and I do not doubt that they will coincide with me in the belief that the committee has done its duty faithfully in the direction of retrenchment and economy in the expenditures of the Government while fully preserving the service to meet all the requirements of our Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, a single word further on this subject.

The gentleman from Georgia, in rather an authoritative manner, spoke of the fact that the consul could have no diplomatic duties. This is the general rule of the service. But the consul-general at Havana has been charged, by order of the department, for long years with duties semidiplomatic, which he discharges regularly and very frequently, by interviews with the captain-general. The very dispatches I mentioned as having been sent by him, in relation to this business which he was carrying on with the captain-general, who is to some extent the viceroy of that island, indicate that fact. These same questions are often taken to Madrid.

Indeed, three-fourths of the questions that come to the legation at Madrid for the minister come from the consulate-general at Havana. The amount of commerce, the gentleman now thinks, is not of as much importance in finding out the duties of a consul and how hard he works. Remember the consul has charge of verifying the values in these statements which are sent, upon which is based the action of our customs officers when the goods reach the United States.

The merchandise coming from these ports is enormous in extent, and we hope to see this trade rapidly widened and enlarged. It calls for an officer of high ability, of the highest integrity, of experience, of special knowledge, and if you fix a cheaper price you will get a cheaper man. This has been a difficult post to fill, and I make this motion purely in the interest of the public service. I do not know anything concerning the personal interests of anyone connected with the places themselves.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is a consul-general, as appears from the debate; there are several consulates and several commercial agencies, more than a dozen, in this little island of Cuba, and my friend credits the consul at Havana with all that trade. The whole island is circled with consulates and consular agents.

Mr. HOLMAN. How many consuls?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not time to count, but the map is beautifully spotted; as many stars as there are on the flag.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some eight or ten.

Mr. BLOUNT. More than that. And my friend has credited all this to Havana. He refers to the difficulties of communication at Cuba. Mr. Speaker, we are in great peril down there from that little island. I will venture to say that in a matter of any consequence between here and Havana there is communication at once with the State Department in a few hours; that one day will cover it.

The difficulties my friend speaks of are not so serious. They are all vague. He tells you of the great duties and the great troubles of the service down there; and while my friend was on this subject the other day he told you of the great responsibilities attending the making of invoices, but before he got through, going on to another subject, he told you, in discussing the matter of feed consuls, and saying you had to have foreigners in the place, that where there were difficulties in invoicing, in ascertaining the proper invoices of goods, the Secretary of State authorized him to employ experts; so that on all difficult questions, all over Europe and everywhere, according to my friend, we have got foreigners supplementing the ignorance of our people, and in the nature of experts. All along the line the criticisms that have been made in reference to this service vanish the instant a man sees what the truth is in relation to the service. It is all magnified.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES, CONSULAR SERVICE.

Consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, Rio de Janeiro, and Liverpool, at $5,000 each, $25,000;
Consuls-general at Shanghai and Calcutta, at $5,000 each, $10,000;
Consul-general at Kanagawa, $4,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 10, line 18, by inserting, after "each," the following: "Consul-general at Halifax and Vienna, $3,500 each; consul-general in Ecuador, $3,000; consul-general at Ottawa, Frankfort, Apia, St. Petersburg, Rome, and Constantinople, $3,000 each; consul-general at Nuevo Laredo, $2,500; consul-general at Tangiers, $2,000;" and strike out the word "sixteen" from said line and insert the words "forty-eight;" and by inserting the words "five hundred" after "thousand" in said line.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is a clerical amendment to which there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consul at Hongkong, $5,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 10, line 18, by inserting, after the word "Hongkong," the words "and Liverpool;" and by inserting, after the word "dollars," the word "each."

Mr. BLOUNT. This is simply clerical.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, $73,500.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 1, page 11, by striking out the words "seventy-three" and inserting the words "one hundred and forty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLASS II.

At $3,500 per annum.

Great Britain: Consul at Halifax, $3,500.

Austria: Consul at Vienna, $3,500.

Total, $7,000.

Mr. POST. I want to inquire whether you intended that there should be a consul-general at Vienna?

Mr. BLOUNT. That has already been inserted. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking from page 11 the whole of class 2, embracing lines 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLASS III.

At $3,000 per annum.

Mr. POST. In the old bill the provision was made in the thirty-five hundred class for a consul to Havre and a consul to Callao. The bill fixes the salary at $3,000, and I want to offer an amendment there. I want to have Callao and Havre included in the $3,500 class.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. POST. They are placed in the $3,000 class.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course, if the gentleman from Illinois wants to offer an amendment, it is in order.

Mr. POST. Where should they properly come in? It would change the bill itself, as there is no section for them.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the amendment is agreed to, then it would be followed up by an amendment to be put in class two. Better try to get your amendment passed first.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding a consul at Havre and Callao.

Mr. HITT. You had better put in one place at a time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible to hear what is going on between the gentlemen. The Chair is not able to state any proposition to the committee. Does the gentleman propose an amendment?

Mr. POST. I move to amend by adding a "consul at Callao, $3,500."

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that will not be done. There does not appear to be any reason for it.

Mr. POST. It is the present law.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the difficulty with all this bill, and that is all there is in these proposed amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up the amendment to the Clerk's desk. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman's amendment has not been put in form

Mr. BLOUNT. It has been voted down, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POST. Oh, no.

Mr. BLOUNT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not think he wanted to speak on it.

Mr. POST. I wanted to get attention to the question here.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman demands a division that question has been settled.

Mr. POST. I demand a division.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 19, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLASS III.

At $3,000 per annum.

Mr. BLOUNT. I sent up an amendment awhile ago to be voted on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the whole of class 2, on page 11, including lines 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is a transfer.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote has been taken upon that amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand it was not.

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to know what is the amendment the gentleman from Georgia refers to?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is a clerical error. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion behind me that I can not even hear the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. HITT and Mr. POST].

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask that the amendment before the House be read.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending now.

Mr. HITT. It is hardly fair to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST] and myself not to permit us to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will certainly do so.

Mr. HITT. Because the bill as printed is not in the slightest degree a guide to the member who wishes to offer an amendment. An amendment can not be made intelligible. Class 2 is stricken out. I wished to insert various posts in class 2, and had prepared amendments for that purpose.

Mr. MCCREARY. I understood the gentleman to say that that clause was stricken out, and when it was stricken out the gentleman from Georgia said it was a mere clerical error.

Mr. HITT. That is all stricken out.

Mr. BLOUNT. If I am allowed, I think I can get myself out of the difficulty.

Mr. HITT. I would like to hear you.

Mr. BLOUNT. These were in class 2, and were transferred. That is what the committee agreed to.

Mr. HITT. But you struck them out here for the purpose of putting them in another place.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendment itself is a mere clerical error.

Mr. HITT. I again submit an amendment, and I doubt very much the ability of the committee to understand the amendment in the present condition of the bill when the whole class is taken out. I wanted to insert seven or eight posts in that class, but the whole class is out, and there is no item to which it may be made an amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not the fault of the bill at all. I had no knowledge of the gentleman's desire to offer an amendment. We have made these changes, and the gentleman from Illinois certainly knew that these amendments were to be offered; and if he did not offer his amendment as an amendment to that paragraph before the motion to strike it out was made, which he had a perfect right to do, he ought not to charge the fault upon me; and he ought not to blame me for the result of his own failure to conduct himself according to the rules.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the rebuke of the chairman of the committee, who charges me with having failed to conduct myself according to the rules, perhaps he had better apply that to himself. The rules require the chairman of the committee to report the bill, and that it be put in type, so that the members can read it; and yet we never had an idea of the amendments that were to be offered, where it is proposed to strike out whole classes and correct the geography of the world.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Illinois, who knows so well that there were a number of typographical errors in this bill and that it was a question as to whether they should be corrected by a reprint of the bill or by amendment, and when he makes the criticism that he has made—then there were some questions of geography, they were mistakes which nobody could have made intentionally; yet the gentleman would leave the impression with the House that these errors were made intentionally or through ignorance.

Mr. HITT. Not at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, as the gentleman has referred to my criticism as to himself and as to amendments to this bill, I say he shall have an opportunity to offer all the amendments he wants. I did not know that he had any.

I offered and sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment striking out class 2. The gentleman was here. I had no reason to suppose he did not know what was going on. The amendment was agreed to, and that class was struck out. The gentleman before that action was taken could have moved an amendment to that clause on the bill.

Mr. HITT. I will try my luck on an amendment at hazard. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, after line 2, insert:
"China: consuls at Amoy, Canton, Chin-Kiang, Foo-Choo, Hankow, and Tientsin, $3,500 each."

Mr. POST. The consuls here named are all in class 2, as I understand.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. POST. The amendment accords with the old law. The law as it now stands places these consuls in classes; and from striking out class 2 disorder has resulted.

Mr. BLOUNT. The only "disorder" is that officers who have been getting $3,500 salary are reduced to $3,000; no officers are left in the $3,500 class.

Mr. POST. That class is destroyed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes. But I do not think it is fatal to the country.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] move that the committee rise. This is Saturday evening, and we are evidently in some confusion about this business.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not observe any "confusion" at all except the usual confusion.

Mr. HITT. I have tried to get this matter in such order as I could.

Mr. BLOUNT. If gentlemen state that by reason of confusion the amendment striking out this class was adopted without their knowledge I will ask that they be allowed to offer amendments under this class; but I am not willing this should be done upon the idea that there has been any fault on my part.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to reconsider—

Mr. HITT. Do we require anybody's consent to offer amendments to this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course not; but gentlemen are required to observe the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote adopting his amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. The question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] amounts to a criticism on me that is wholly untenable. The paragraph was struck out by a vote of the Committee of the Whole. The order in which the gentleman's purpose could have been reached was to amend the paragraph before it was struck out.

Mr. HITT. My amendment is perfectly in order. We have reached line 10; and I will move the amendment to be inserted before line 10. This is strictly in order, after you have struck out all that is between line 1 and line 10.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman understands, I presume, that numbers of lines do not make paragraphs of the bill. We have reached class 3; and we have passed away from the other matter, so that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. There need be no difficulty about this matter—

Mr. BLOUNT. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall be entertained, if it be offered without this criticism on me; otherwise I object.

Mr. POST. I made no criticism on the chairman of the committee at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. If gentlemen state that they did not understand that an amendment was offered by me to strike out the paragraph I am perfectly willing that consent be allowed to offer amendments to the paragraph.

Mr. POST. The trouble is that the striking out of the entire class has brought about confusion in our attempt to offer amendments. We desired to put them in under that class.

Mr. BLOUNT. If, as the result of any confusion, gentlemen were misled, I am perfectly willing that the matter be reconsidered. There was no fault on my part. I proceeded in a regular and parliamentary way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to striking out lines 2 to 8, inclusive. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and those lines are now before the committee for consideration. The Clerk will read the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] sends up.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, after line 7, insert:

"China: Consuls at Amoy, Canton, Chinkiang, Foochow, Hankow, and Tientsin, $3,500 each."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment restores the Chinese consulates to the $3,500 class. Those posts are now all salaried at $3,500; the bill proposes to reduce them to $3,000 each. They are seaports; they are cities where we have missionaries, and where there is a large commerce of the United States. Unfortunately it is not an increasing commerce. I doubt whether it will increase much speedily.

Mr. ANDREW. By reason of the tariff law, or the Chinese exclusion act?

Mr. HITT. Most of the trade is on the free list; the exclusion act does not help trade.

The exports from the city of Amoy amounted to over $5,000,000 sent to the United States last year. Some of these other places were much less. At two or three of these there is a considerable body of American citizens who have to be protected.

But, Mr. Chairman, one feature that I ask careful attention to is that every one of these officials is a judge of a court, with equity jurisdiction, common-law jurisdiction, and criminal jurisdiction. He takes a man and tries him for his life, sentences him to fine, imprisonment, or death; and there are cases where he has tried a man, condemned him, taken him right out in front of the consulate, and had him hanged by the neck until he was dead.

They are clothed with enormous powers over our citizens who are there. By treaty with China we allow no American to be tried before a Chinese judge. He is never held amenable to their law. He is tried by the consular courts. The property that belongs to American citizens in that country is large in volume and value. It has been firmly guarded heretofore.

The commerce that comes from these towns is, in part, in fabrics of silk, on which the duties are 60 per cent and upwards when they enter the ports of the United States. The temptation on the part of the merchant sending them is proportionately great, and the officer who has charge of the verification of the invoices which determine the value on which the duty is collected must be, and ought to be, a man of a very high character, who could not be tempted astray. They are shipping ports. They are places where our seamen go.

I would that there were more of our seamen and a more prosperous merchant marine, more like our marine in the olden time. Our seamen need the protection of the consuls there far more than they need it in English or German ports. Remember that these are not civilized, Christian, and law-abiding countries, such as we are accustomed to deal with. The authorities are arbitrary there. It depends largely on the individual executing it; and the consul is in the highest sense the daily protector of our citizens.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the same impression which the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs holds I once held, at least in degree; and I examined that whole body of consulates to find out the cost of living at each post, the business done, the possibility of reducing the salaries and still obtaining the services of men who would be thoroughly equal to the duties and fit to exercise such responsible functions as a consul, a judge, and a superintendent of all the American interests there, for he is almost a monarch in many things. After looking at all of the circumstances surrounding them, I was forced to admit that they were paid nothing but what men ought to have under the circumstances in which they must live in those countries, and the duties they are forced to perform.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I again invite the attention of the committee carefully to the situation here. The gentleman from Illinois has presented one side of this question. The first thing I wish to call your attention to is the business done there in the matter of commerce. At Amoy the salary of the consul is $3,500, and we propose to reduce it to $3,000, and the fees collected, according to the last report, were $1,028. At Chinkiang the salary is $3,000 and the fees were $36, at Foochow the salary is the same and the fees collected $388; at Hankow the salary is the same and the fees $250; while at Tientsin the salary is $3,000 and the fees $820.50.

Now, it is quite clear that that is not all the work the consul has to do. He certifies invoices; and the gentleman has himself said that where there was difficulty in ascertaining values he is allowed an expert. So much for that.

Then my friend tells us of the matter of relieving our seamen. There has not been a seaman relieved in a year at either of these places, according to the report of the Fifth Auditor, and I now invite attention to the fact. The gentleman next calls attention to this enormous judicial power which is exercised by these officials. In the first place, the foreign population in China in 1888 and 1890 aggregated only 1,028 persons, of whom more than half were missionaries, according to the table which I append, which shows the American population at these several points, the number of missionaries, and the total trade with this country. This table is as follows:

American population in China, 1898 and 1899.
1888.

	Total population.	Missionaries.
Shanghai.....	400	(*)
Ningpo.....	44	35
Fuchau.....	51	42

Tientsin.....	186	152
Newchwang.....	12	(*)
Total.....	1,022

*Not known.

†See Consular Reports, No. 102, page 214, for details.

Total American population.....	1,153

Trade, 1890.

	Taels.
Imports from United States.....	539,329 = $619,207 +
Exports to United States.....	514,817 = 591,009 +
Coasting trade by United States citizens.....	440,968 = 506,231 +
Total American trade.....	1,716,447 +

Part of the coasting trade consists in carrying from one Chinese port to another goods from the United States or intended for exportation thither. The total therefore is in excess of all our trade to the extent that part of the foreign trade is counted in the coasting trade.

According to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, we have got to have courts of justice there, to look after the missionaries, with enormous powers. I do not think that there is any danger on that subject.

The total American population in all China is 1,153 persons. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, you have the enormous scope of the judicial functions of these people, some eight or ten of them, who have within their jurisdiction about a thousand people, and nearly all of them missionaries. What a magnificent responsibility rests upon these gentlemen. Why should they not be paid these enormous fees? I am quite willing that this should be discussed all along the line!

Mr. POST. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Post].

Mr. POST. The object is simply to make class 2 stand just as it does now in the law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding:

"Consul at Havre and consul at Callao."

Mr. BLOUNT. That has been voted on and voted down.

Mr. POST. I thought we went back to clause 2. I thought that was the understanding.

Mr. BLOUNT. But that was voted on and voted down.

Mr. POST. My only purpose was to take up class 2 and get through with it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want to be ungenerous, and I will not make the point of order. I will let the gentleman offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Post].

Mr. HITT. I wish to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. The gentleman is not familiar with the character of the business of a consul in these ports having charge of seamen if he thinks that the relieving of seamen and the trying of them upon charges are all that he does. That is a very small part of the duties of a consul—two items only. The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] lives on a coast that furnishes many mariners, who go to the four corners of the earth, and he knows how often they need advice and authority, how often they are protected in the matters of their contracts with officers over them, how they are hired and discharged, how their personal fate depends upon protection in these ports.

Mr. BUSHNELL. If an offense is committed on a vessel at sea, would it not be the duty of the officers of the vessel to turn over the offender to the consular court?

Mr. HITT. That would depend upon the jurisdiction. A crime committed on a vessel might be punished by the consul, or the offender might be turned over to the tribunal at home.

Mr. BUSHNELL. But the consul at the first port where the vessel lands has some action to take in the matter.

Mr. HITT. Certainly. Canton is the great place of transshipment of seamen. It is a very prominent shipping port in those seas. The consul at nearly every one of these cities has the protection of the missionaries; and I was very sorry to note that the chairman [Mr. BLOUNT] considered that an unimportant matter. Missionaries are entitled to protection as citizens, even if they are missionaries, and a great many people feel an interest in them. They have in one sense a representative character in many ways. They are sent out by organizations of our people, by churches, and I received more expressions of interest from the people concerning the welfare of these self-denying men than as to any other class of American citizens who are abroad. They are in a country that is to them almost wholly without law, and they are there in some degree as delegates, sentinels, representatives of the best thought of a Christian world, and they are performing a high duty that is often amid great and terrible perils.

I am sure the American people believe that our consuls, where they show vigilance in protecting them and their property from mobs, in protecting those who were around the missionaries and who lean upon them, converts and others, are doing exactly the duty that the people of the United States desire on the part of consuls. Missionaries are not very great in number; but the Americans there do not make a large population; but I think a thousand American citizens are worth our care and are worth a great deal more than a thousand dollars, or than a great many thousand dollars. Human life and the rights of citizens are the highest issues that can come under the jurisdiction of the officers created by our laws.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman answers me by a suggestion that I am not informed about the duties of a consul in relation to seamen. He stated it a little more softly than that. It may be true, Mr. Chairman, that I am uninformed, but it appears that the Fifth Auditor is informed, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] does not take his information from that source. I have his report. It is a statement of relief afforded to seamen, with extra wages and arrears, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891. It states the number relieved, the clothing furnished, their expenses, etc. There is not a single item for service to a single sailor at one of the ports which the gentleman has been discussing.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will allow me to complete my statement. Now, another thing: My friend says he thinks that the missionaries are entitled to protection of the courts. He intimates that he understood that I differed with him about that.

Mr. HITT. I understood you to differ with me about the importance of having officers of ability and learning there to act as judges and to protect the lives of citizens and missionaries.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I will make myself better understood. I think very few gentlemen could have interpreted my language in the way the gentleman has. I take it for granted that in a body like this House of Representatives of the American Congress it is not necessary for me to state that we all have regard for Christianity and regard for its promotion everywhere. I had thought that would be so promptly assented to that it would give rise to no such criticism as my friend makes; but what I intended by reference to them as missionaries was to show that they were not men who committed crimes, that they were nor lawless people, and therefore that difficulties were not so numerous amongst them as amongst some other classes of citizens. That was all there was in that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with that sort of population, made up of men engaged in clerical work, I can not conceive that the civil officers that this country sends there, no matter what grade they belong to, are in any danger of stringing them up and hanging them. There is too much danger in that business. It sounds tremendously in aid of increasing appropriations when you talk about the vast functions and powers to be exercised, but when you tear the veil down and look at the situation as it is there is no gentleman in this House who will not see at once that the duties are light so far as the judicial functions are concerned.

Mr. DINGLEY. What I endeavored to call the attention of my friend from Georgia to was the fact that the report of the Fifth Auditor, to which the gentleman has referred, covers only one single item of the duties of a consul with reference to seamen, and that relates to where the relief has been afforded.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is mistaken. I have the document here.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has nothing to do with relieving the amount of work that the consuls have with reference to the shipping and the discharge of seamen. The gentleman can not get any proper idea of the work of a consul as shipping commissioner with reference to these seamen by referring to the report of the Fifth Auditor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have just one answer to that. The gentleman's bill with reference to the shipping and discharge of seamen involves charges throughout the world.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman referred to the work of the consuls engaged in the discharge of those duties.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that; but if the gentleman will allow me I will go on.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think I have the floor, rather than the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. I beg pardon; I thought I was answering a question of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. I took the floor and undertook to answer the gentleman. If the gentleman has not completed his remarks I will not proceed until he has concluded.

Mr. BLOUNT. I had addressed myself to the Chair, and thought I was recognized. If the gentleman has the floor of course I yield.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to answer the gentleman on the very point that he was on. What I desired to call attention to is simply the fact that the report of the Fifth Auditor has nothing in the world to do with the consuls with reference to the shipping and discharge of sailors. While the shipping act of 1884 does abolish fees with reference to shipping and discharge of seamen, it does not take away any of the duties in relation to the shipping or discharge of seamen; and if the gentleman will look at the reports showing the duties of the various consuls, acting officially as shipping commissioners, he will see that in ports like Canton and other ports referred to by the gentleman a large amount of duties are performed by the several consuls.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course it is impossible for me to answer in detail as to the amount of these services rendered to American seamen and vessels throughout the world; but the information from the State Department received when we were framing this bill was that the loss in fees by reason of the legislation to which the gentleman refers is $80,000 throughout the entire world.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is right.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is all there is in it, and there is nothing else shown as to the duty of the consuls; but that $80,000 was distributed over the several hemispheres. So that there can not be left a very large amount of duties in that direction in any one place. Now, I understand, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of commerce at Canton, and a great deal throughout the world; but unfortunately when we get away from our own seacoast we do not carry much of it ourselves.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by his courtesy enables me to read a statement furnished by the Department of State that illustrates exactly the point that the gentleman from Maine was making. At Callao, during the three successive quarters in 1890 and 1891, the number of vessels arriving were 10; departing, 12; seamen arriving, 306; departing, 294; discharged, 45; shipped, 110; deserted, 24; died, 1; number of seamen remaining in from one quarter to the next succeeding, 115; fees received during these three quarters, $160.50. The fees received are no criterion of the work done. If fees were charged for the services rendered to American vessels they would probably reach $8,000. The fees actually collected are about $160, and that exactly illustrates the point which the gentleman from Maine made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HITT. There was an amendment offered by the gentleman to strike out lines 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7624) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations—

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Division.

The House divided; and pending the count

Mr. HOLMAN said: Mr. Speaker, I see that the House wishes to adjourn, and I do not ask for any further count.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock) the House adjourned.

Mr. VEST. I present a petition of the St. Mark's English Evangelical Lutheran Church, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for legislation by Congress prohibiting the opening of the World's Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath.

I want to call attention to this petition. It seems to have been a machine petition, printed and addressed originally to the Senators from Ohio, "Hon. JOHN SHERMAN and Hon. CALVIN BRICE." Those names are scratched out now, and the petition is addressed to Hon. F. M. COCKRELL and GEORGE G. VEST," from Missouri, and contains this remarkable resolution:

Resolved. That we do hereby pledge ourselves and each other that we will, from this time henceforth, refuse to vote for or support for any office or position of trust any member of Congress, either Senator or Representative, who shall vote for any further aid of any kind to the World's Fair, except it be on the conditions named in these resolutions.

I merely want to say as a Senator that whatever may be my vote upon the question of closing the Exposition on Sunday, I shall certainly pay no attention to this class of resolutions. I do not hold the people who sent the petition to me entirely responsible, for they are very respectable people of that congregation and have signed this petition without scrutiny. It has obviously been prepared in the city of Washington and sent out from this place as a sort of political blackmail on the representatives of the people. If that kind of practice is to continue, and if, when I believed a bill or joint resolution not constitutional, I am still to vote for it under the pain and penalty of being put out of public life, so far as I am concerned I do not want to hold office if I am to hold it upon any such condition. If I can not exercise my judgment as a representative, as a Senator of the people, without that sort of coercion, I do not care about holding office at all. This question is before a committee of which I am a member, and we have been considering it very carefully.

I will say now, parenthetically, that a much more serious question, it seems to me, is in regard to the expenditures that have been made by the World's Columbian Exposition. I notice that of the $5,000,000 that was to be contributed by the city of Chicago $90,000 has been expended for the location of the Exposition in that city. I hope the House committee that visited the city of Chicago and investigated the affairs of the Exposition will see whether the $90,000 expenditure was necessary, and how it was expended, and who got the money. I was of the opinion when the bill was first presented here and when we voted upon it, and I so stated as the RECORD will show, that after expending the $5,000,000 Chicago would then come to Congress and say it was necessary to the honor of the entire country that the Exposition should be worthy of the people of the United States. The result has proved, I am sorry to say, just what I anticipated.

I propose that my vote shall be governed, not by the question alone whether the Exposition is closed or opened on the Sabbath day or by the sale of beer upon the grounds, but by my general opinion, based upon all the facts, as to whether the honor of this country is involved in the continued reckless expenditure of money such as I believe has taken place.

That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory for said line of its railway, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein provided to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company; and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, custom, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, and one by said railroad company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior, within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of the court held at Muscogee, Ind. T., upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile.

Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railroad company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court held at Muscogee, Ind. T., which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition, according to the laws of the said State provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the cost of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railway company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Arkansas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation; and said railway company shall transport troops and property of the United States free of charge.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes through whose lands said line may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territory, said payments to be made in installments of $500 each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose land said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location, as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowance hereinbefore provided for, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company for said dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation or tribe would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territory is owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said Territory. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him, in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force, among the different nations and tribes, according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations and tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroad as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said Territory to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior and also to be filed in the office of the principal chief of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employees of said company, necessary to the construction and management of said road, shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That the United States circuit and district courts for the western district of Arkansas, and such other courts as may be authorized by Congress, shall have, without reference to the amount in controversy, concurrent jurisdiction over all controversies arising between Quanah and Oklahoma Railway Company and the nations and tribes through whose territory said railway shall be constructed. Said courts shall have like jurisdiction, without reference to the amount in controversy, over all controversies arising between the inhabitants of said nations or tribes and said railway company; and the civil jurisdiction of said courts is hereby extended within the limits of said Indian Territory, without distinction as to citizenship of the parties, so far as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That said railway company shall build at least 50 miles of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 10. That the said Quanah and Oklahoma Railway Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors, and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking toward the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nations any further grant of land, or its occupancy, than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 11. That all mortgages executed by said railway company conveying any portion of its railroad, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 12. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

SEC. 13. That the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the road, except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that is a very long and extraordinary bill to grant a right of way to a railroad company through an Indian reservation. It seems to embrace all sorts of subjects, and I do not think it ought to be passed in the morning hour, unless some Senator can explain it.

If the bill is only intended to carry out what the title says, to authorize a certain railway company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, it certainly ought not to cover so much space. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator from Ohio will permit a suggestion, I will say that this bill contains the provisions which are incorporated in all the bills which have been passed giving railroad companies the right to construct railroads through the Indian Territory. There has been a form adopted by the Committees on Indian Affairs of the two Houses, and it has been accepted by the two Houses as a proper form. This amendment contains all the safeguards of those bills. There is nothing contained in this which has not been embraced in a dozen similar bills we have passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I would advise the committee to adopt Dr. Franklin's prescription; that is, to put all this material in one bill, and then say that such and such a railway may be constructed in accordance with that general law.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] reported the bill, and I would say to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senator from Ohio is making some inquiries in reference to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I was out of the Chamber for a moment and I did not hear the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is for the purpose of authorizing the construction of a railroad through an Indian reservation, and embraces a great variety of legislation of a very peculiar character.

Mr. PLATT. The bill is in the ordinary form.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think if it was simply a general bill relating to the general construction of railroads through Indian reservations it might be wise enough.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The bill is put in the usual form in which the committee puts all bills granting rights of way through the Indian Territory. There was a form adopted by the Committee on Indian Affairs years ago guarding various points, which was carefully considered by the committee, and incorporated in a bill reported from that committee by me. This bill is exactly in the form of the other bills, so as to treat all these companies alike.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I ask the Senator, would it not be better to have a general law containing all the necessary provisions for the construction of railroads through Indian reservations, and when we took up a particular case it would merely be necessary to pass a law authorizing the construction of such a railway through such a reservation.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have been an advocate for years of a general law authorizing anybody who chooses to do so to build a railway across that country, subject to all the limitations we put in these bills. I believe it ought to be done. But there seems to have been some objection to it, and it has been urged by some that Congress ought to consider the propriety or impropriety of building every railroad. That rule has been followed out by the committee with uniformity. In this particular case the bill was introduced not at all in the form that the committee usually reports such bills. The gentleman who was here asking for the passage of the bill came to see me about it, and I explained to him that we would put the bill in the usual form if we reported it at all; that we were not inclined to report bills for the construction of railroads which were not likely to be built.

Gen. Dodge was here some time afterwards and spoke to me about it. He said this company intended to build a road from Fort Worth to Denver, and assured me that the right of way was wanted in good faith with the intention of building the road. When I became satisfied that it was the intention to build the road, and that it was not a mere paper enterprise for sale, I was instructed to report the bill back to the Senate favorably, which was done, and I framed the bill myself in the usual form that these bills are made, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting precisely what has been passed in every similar instance.

I am glad to have the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio as to a general law on this subject, because I have been advocating it for a long time past, and have during this session been debating in my mind the propriety of preparing a general bill to cover all these questions and avoid the necessity of passing a special bill for every railroad proposed to be built in that country. I think I shall at an early day present a bill of that character to the committee and ask their action upon it.

Mr. VEST. One section of this bill will never pass without my strenuous opposition, and that is section 8 of the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like the Senator to read the section he criticizes.

Mr. VEST. It is section 8, which confers jurisdiction upon the courts of Texas, Arkansas, and Kansas as to suits between this railroad company and the Indian tribes or people. That is the section.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think, unless there is some misprint in the bill, the Senator has misread the section. The law has been all the time to confer such jurisdiction upon the courts through the country where the road is to run as they may have under the law, for all these roads will go through a part of the Indian Territory which is under the jurisdiction of the Paris court, the court at Fort Smith, and the court in Kansas, without stopping to see whether it touches in any one of these districts at any time. This provision was put in the bill so that the jurisdiction of the whole matter is conferred upon the courts as they have it already; but my recollection of the section is that this jurisdiction shall be conferred upon those courts and such courts in the Indian Territory as have been and may be from time to time created by act of Congress, so that these different courts have their accustomed jurisdiction, and this is simply asserting the jurisdiction they otherwise have.

Mr. VEST. This gives a concurrent jurisdiction to those outside courts with the court we have already established for the trial of civil causes in the Indian Territory. Under the act which established the Territory of Oklahoma, with which the Senator from Arkansas is entirely familiar, we provided:

And the jurisdiction of the United States court established under and by virtue of "An act to establish a United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1889, is hereby limited to and shall extend only over the Indian Territory, as defined in this section; that the court established by said act shall, in addition to the jurisdiction conferred thereon by said act, have and exercise within the limits of the Indian Territory jurisdiction in all civil cases in the Indian Territory.

We established that court with that jurisdiction, and a judge was appointed with a marshal and a clerk. Now, it is proposed to extend this jurisdiction, and we are to give a concurrent jurisdiction as to any suits in which this railroad company is involved to the court at Paris or the court at Fort Smith or the court in Kansas.

I am utterly opposed to any such legislation. There is no reason at all why these outside courts should have jurisdiction in those cases. That court which we established within the Indian Territory is entirely competent; juries can be obtained there equal to the juries in any of the adjacent States, and my own State adjoins that Territory.

If we propose to teach these Indians our modes of life, our administration of law, and our ideas of justice, we can never do it by dragging them out of the Territory upon the writ of any corporation to be tried before alien juries outside of their own country. There is no necessity for any such provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. VEST. I do not object. I simply want the sense of the Senate on the section of the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the bill may go over. I think probably I shall want to offer an amendment to it on page 7.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go over, and the next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

WARREN HALL.

The bill (S. 789) for the relief of Warren Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confer on the Court of Claims original jurisdiction to hear and adjudicate, according to justice and right and according to the provisions of section 3 of the act approved March 12, 1863, commonly known as "the captured and abandoned property act," the case of Warren Hall, as originally tried and reported in the ninth Court of Claims Reports, page 170, and known as "Hall and Roche's case," notwithstanding the former trial. If it shall appear that Hall was, in fact, free born he shall be deemed to be entitled to all such rights as he would have been entitled to if he had continued a free man, notwithstanding he may have been reduced to a state of slavery de facto wrongfully or by operation of the laws of any State. The bar of limitation is removed; and for this purpose the court shall hear and consider the new testimony and any other proper testimony which may be offered at the trial by the claimant, on the part of the defendant Government, and the testimony considered by the court in the original trial, so far as the same may be applicable to the new trial, shall also be available.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRICE OF DESERT LANDS.

The bill (S. 2092) to fix the price of lands entered under the desert-land laws was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the report may be read in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAREY, March 16, 1892:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2092) to fix the price of lands under the desert-land law, have had the same under consideration and recommend that the bill pass with amendments.

The desert-land law, which was approved March 3, 1877, fixed the price of desert lands at $1.25 an acre, one-fifth of which, or 25 cents, was required to be paid at the time the original entry was made, and four-fifths, or $1, was required to be paid at the time of final proof or entry. This appears from the decisions to have been the accepted price, without the same having been even questioned, for the period of more than ten years, whether the lands entered were situated inside or outside the limits of railroad grants.

The language of the desert-land law is clear and explicit, and there can be no doubt that it was the intention of Congress at the time of the passage of the act to make a uniform price of $1.25 for all lands sold under the desert-land law, and that no exception to the rule was contemplated where the desert lands were situated inside of the railroad limits.

Without additional legislation a circular was issued by the General Land Office in 1887 declaring that thereafter purchasers of desert lands would be required to pay 50 cents per acre at the time of original entry and $2 per acre at the time of final proof. Rulings in compliance with this circular at local land offices were contested. Though there appears to have been a great difference of opinion on the subject, the Secretary of the Interior on an appealed case held, in 1889, "that the act of March 3, 1853, fixing the price of public lands within railroad limits at $2.50 an acre, was not repealed by the desert-land act, which fixed the price of desert land at $1.25 an acre."

This decision was reached under the rule of construction that statutes are repealed by express provisions of a subsequent law, or by necessary implication, and in the latter case there must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the old and new law that they can not stand together or be consistently reconciled.

In some cases the land was entered at $1.25 an acre, and at the time of final proof the entrymen were required to pay for the land at the rate of $2.50 an acre. Applications were made by entrymen in some instances for the repayment of the amount overpaid on final certificates. These applications were rejected on the ground that repayment can not be recognized in the absence of express statutory authority.

The committee find that since the passage of the act approved March 3, 1890, which, among other things, amended the desert-land law of March 3, 1877, the uniform ruling of the land department has been to declare the price of all lands, subject to entry under the desert-land laws, at $1.25 an acre.

Desert lands are those that will not produce agricultural crops without artificial irrigation, which under the most favorable conditions is expensive. The committee, without questioning the decisions of the Land Department, think that the Government is amply paid for these lands at $1.25 an acre, especially if an incident of their sale is a reclamation of the land.

The second section of the bill authorizes the repayment to entrymen of the excess which was required to be paid by them of over $1.25 an acre for desert lands. The bill is approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington.

SIR: I am in receipt by reference from you of Senate bill 2092, entitled "A bill to fix the price of lands entered under the desert-land laws," with a request for an expression of the views of this Department thereon.

I herewith inclose a copy of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on said bill, and I see no objection to the passage of the same.

Very respectfully,

GEO. CHANDLER,
First Assistant Secretary.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C., February 19, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of a copy of Senate bill 2092, Fifty-second Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to fix the price of lands entered under the desert-land laws," referred by the honorable First Assistant Secretary, February 15, 1892, for report in duplicate.

The provision of the first section of said bill, fixing the price of desert lands at $1.25 per acre, agrees with the construction already placed by the Department upon the act of March 3, 1891 (see 14 L. D., 74), and as the second section provides for the repayment of any excess above that sum in entries already made, thus securing a uniform price in all desert-land cases, I see no objection to the bill becoming a law.

Attention is, however, invited to a clerical error in the fifth line of the bill, where the words "eighty-seven" should be "seventy-seven."

The copy of said bill is herewith returned.

Respectfully,

THOS. H. CARTER,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 5, before the word "entitled," to strike out the date "1887" and insert "1877;" so as to make the section read:

That the price of lands that may be entered under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories," or the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," so far as said provisions are amendatory of said desert-land act, shall be $1.25 per acre, whether said lands shall be outside or included within a railroad grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 6, after the words "heirs or," to strike out "assigns" and insert "legal representatives;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That in all cases where parties have entered lands under the provisions of the desert-land laws, and have been required to pay a double minimum price for the same, for the reason that such entries were included in a railroad grant, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be repaid to the person who made such entry, or to his heirs or legal representatives, the excess of the amount paid over and above $1.25 per acre, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall be paid in the same manner as is now provided to refund purchase money on lands erroneously sold by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. H. WARD.

The bill (S. 789) for the relief of W. H. Ward was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that the Senate Committee on Patents of the Forty-eighth Congress, by virtue of an act approved March 3, 1883, referred to the Court of Claims the petition and claims of William Henry Ward (formerly of Auburn, N. Y., and also of Monongahela City, Pa., but now of Alexandria, Va.) against the United States for a shell-molding machine, and also for the infringement and use of his bullet-machine patents, namely, one of March 20, 1855, for an "improved press for making cylindro-hollow-conical projectiles by pressure," and the other of November 10, 1857, for an improved bullet machine, and numbered, respectively, 12574 and 18616; and that it is objected that two of these claims are debarred judicial consideration in consequence of existing statutes, to wit, section 1069 of the Revised Statutes limiting the time within which claims are to be prosecuted before the Court of Claims, and one of the claims by section 3477 relating to the assignment of claims against the United States.

The bill therefore proposes to authorize the Court of Claims to examine all the claims of Ward set forth in his petition, notwithstanding the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to in the preamble, and when the facts have been found by the court, to render such judgment thereon as law and equity warrant, without reference to the statutes of limitation or other acts or statutes to the contrary.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. KYLE, March 16, 1892, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 577) for the relief of W. H. Ward, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report as follows:

It appears from the record that Mr. W. H. Ward (formerly of Auburn, N. Y., Pittsburgh, Pa., and now of Alexandria, Va.) secured on the 10th of November, 1857, letters patent for a bullet-making machine, and on the 1st day of December, 1857, a patent for a machine for molding shells. Both of these were granted for a term of fourteen years from their respective dates and were "original" or "first patents."

These patents were the result of extended investigation and long experience upon the part of the inventor, and were brought to their present perfection at a cost to him of nearly $75,000. They are of a class of patents which are valuable in a general way only to governments; and it was upon the sales to governments that he expected to derive his remuneration. The bullet-molding machine enables the molder to compress a ton of cold lead into bullets at a cost of $1.90, being a less amount than the cost of melting the lead. Our Government was quick to seize upon the invention as of great service in case of war, and in 1856 appropriated the machine for use in the navy-yards, without consulting the inventor.

Mr. Ward made his protest to Capt. Dahlgren, of the Ordnance Department, soon after, but received no satisfaction or consideration. In 1859 Mr. Ward crossed the water to introduce his machine to foreign governments, remaining abroad until 1866. Upon his return he went to Chief of Ordnance, Gen. Dyer, with his complaint, but was told that he must seek redress in Congress. Being averse to this he secured the services of Judge Thomas Hood, who prosecuted this case. No satisfaction having been obtained, two bills were finally presented to Congress by him asking an appropriation in behalf of Mr. Ward. Subsequent bills of the same nature passed the House and were referred to the Senate Committee on Patents during the Forty-fourth Congress. Upon request of said committee these bills were withdrawn, the committee offering to introduce a bill referring the case to the Court of Claims.

The bill was drawn and reported favorably by Senator Wadleigh, of New Hampshire. Since that time favorable reports from the Committee on Patents have been made successively by Senators KERNAN, PLATT and TELLER. Bills have passed the Senate at each of past four Congresses.

Your committee are of opinion that Mr. Ward should have the privilege of going with his case before the Court of Claims, and that the Government should not take advantage of any statute of limitations.

We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. Wadleigh, in his report to the Senate of the Forty-fourth Congress, said:

"It is further manifest and known to your committee that William H. Ward made application for the extension of his patents aforesaid, and such extensions were passed through the House of Representatives by an almost unanimous vote during the first session of the Forty-third Congress, and, in their regular order, came to your committee, together with the petition for compensation for the use of the same, and that your committee, considering that the granting of the said extensions would again render the Government liable to William H. Ward, the said patentee, for such extended term of said patents, denied the granting of said extensions, with the understanding that the matter be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication on the merits of the inventions and claims arising therefrom, and, in accordance with such considerations, your committee recommend the accompanying bill, being Senate bill 419, and is, with the papers, with your committee."

Mr. Congressman Kellogg, of Connecticut, in debate on the shell-molding machine extension act, on the 2d of May, 1874, said:

"I have followed the reading of this report, and it seems to me this bill will fail to do justice to the patentee. I know it has been the practice, it was the practice during the war, for the Government to take patents for improvements in arms and war material and use them whenever it thought necessary, because of its strong arm to do so; that nobody would use this patent except the Government."

"The suggestion I wish to make is, if the statements embraced in the report are correct, this man ought to present his claim to Congress for compensation for the use of his patent by the Government, or authority ought to be given to prosecute his claim against the Government in the Court of Claims."

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE AND HYDROGRAPHY,
Washington, October 19, 1859.

SIR: You are requested to have an examination of Mr. W. H. Ward's machine for casting shells, and a report sent to the Bureau of the merits of the invention.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. N. INGRAHAM,
Chief of the Bureau.

Capt. JOHN RUDD,
Commandant Navy-Yard, Washington.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
Washington, October 29, 1859.

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 19th instant, I have examined and tested Mr. W. H. Ward's machine for casting shells.

Having adjusted one of his flasks, Mr. Ward made two 9-inch shells on the 24th instant, of our prescribed dimensions; they were perfect in every particular, and one was fired from the battery. The preparation of the mold can be made in six minutes. The adjustment of the core requires no measurement, and can be accomplished by the least skillful molder.

The increasing demand in the Navy for shells renders it important that the most economical mode of producing them should be employed. The use of Mr. Ward's machine will tend to economize labor, and he thinks will produce a better and sounder shell than we get from our present manner of casting.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. K. MURRAY,
Executive Officer, Ordnance Department.

Capt. JOHN RUDD,
Commanding U. S. Navy-Yard, Washington.

Respectfully referred to Bureau of Ordnance and Hydrography.
JOHN RUDD, Commander.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 14, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 8th instant in reference to the machine furnished by Mr. W. H. Ward, of Auburn, N. Y., that the machine was furnished to the Department, and used for the service of the Government; that it is of present use and value to the service, and that no payment has been made to Mr. Ward for the same.

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. C. D. McDOUGALL,
House of Representatives.

AT THE NAVY-YARD.

The new machine invented by and constructed under the direction of Mr. W. H. Ward, of Auburn, N. Y., for molding musket, rifle, and pistol balls, was landed on Saturday, the 25th. The machine has been brought on at Mr. Ward's own expense, in order that the Government and its officers may have the opportunity to thoroughly test its merits. It is stated to be able to produce one hundred and sixty bullets per minute for any firearm in use, of any weight up to 2 ounces each. This can be done, too, without attendance; the machine, after starting, taking care of itself, so to speak. It is a pretty heavy affair, and weighs about 8,000 pounds. Mr. Ward has brought with it a similar weight of cylindrically pressed lead for immediate conversion into bullets.

All the various styles of firearms known to the English, French, Swiss, and American services can be supplied with exactly suitable bullets, including the hollow-ribbed, conical, and expansion varieties.

It will require till the 1st of December to set the machine in order for operation, which will be in one of the buildings at the navy-yard.

We learn also that Mr. Ward is having constructed at the works of Mr. Jamieson, in Alexandria, a machine for molding shells, likewise his invention.

[The foregoing is copied from a bound volume of the National Intelligencer, in the Library of the Capitol, volume 2, of 1856, of Monday, 27th October, 1856, on page 3, under the head of "Local Items."]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PILOTAGE ON AMERICAN COASTWISE VESSELS.

The bill (S. 1282) exempting American coastwise vessels piloted by their licensed masters or by a United States pilot from the obligation to pay State pilots for services not rendered, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] I ask that that bill may be passed over, retaining its place upon the present Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice and remain on the present Calendar.

Mr. FRYE subsequently said: The bill (S. 1282) exempting American coastwise vessels piloted by their licensed masters or by a United States pilot from the obligation to pay State pilots for services not rendered, was passed over without prejudice. I desire to give notice that immediately after the unfinished business is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

AMANDA G. WALTER.

The bill (S. 259) for the relief of Amanda G. Walter, as executrix of Thomas U. Walter, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill, but I see the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] who reported it, is absent. I ask that it may be passed over without prejudice. The report is a very long one and would consume all the morning hour to read. It is an old claim for personal services and seems to me to need some explanation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

WILHELM SPIEGELBURG.

The bill (S. 1279) for the correction of the military record of Wilhelm Spiegelburg was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES FLETCHER ALIAS JAMES H. MITCHELL.

The bill (S. 2087) for the relief of Charles Fletcher, alias James H. Mitchell, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "date," to insert "of July 16, 1865;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion standing against Charles Fletcher, who served under the name of James H. Mitchell as a private in Company H, Ninety-fifth Regiment of New York State Infantry Volunteers, is hereby removed; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to discharge the said soldier as of the date of July 16, 1865, to which said company and regiment were paid on their discharge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET KENNEDY.

The bill (S. 448) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KYLE. I am requested to ask that this bill may be passed over without prejudice and remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the chair). If there be no objection, the bill will be passed over retaining its place on the Calendar.

LIVERY-STABLE KEEPERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1975) for the protection of livery-stable-keepers and other persons keeping horses at livery within the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL UNION INSURANCE COMPANY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (H. R. 5444) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington," approved February 14, 1865, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know of the Senator reporting this bill what changes it proposes in the existing law in regard to this corporation?

Mr. PERKINS. Under the present law this corporation is limited to nine directors. They desire to have the number increased to fifteen as proposed by the bill.

Under the present law the company can not own real estate exceeding in value, according to my recollection, $100,000. The company recently constructed a brownstone-front building in this city, a very handsome office building, and there is some doubt whether under its present charter it has a right to own so valuable a property as it possesses. To relieve all doubt, the company ask to have the law changed in the particular suggested, so that it may own real estate to the value of $250,000.

This company is one of the most responsible insurance companies in this city. It invests its funds, as most of these insurance companies do, in real-estate loans. This bill provides that it shall not own real estate in excess of $250,000 in value, except as it is required by foreclosure proceedings to take property from time to time, which, however, under this proposed law, it can not hold for more than five years.

The bill has passed the House of Representatives without objection; it was carefully considered by the committee of the Senate, and was unanimously reported. It was thought that the bill was right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask whether the House or the Senate bill is being considered?

Mr. PERKINS. The House bill is being considered, as I understand it. The Senate bill was laid upon the table, as I remember, or indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was looking at the Calendar to see if this was a House bill. There are two bills here just the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDNANCE STORES AND SUPPLIES TO NEBRASKA.

The bill (S. 1348) for the issue of ordnance stores and supplies to the State of Nebraska, to replace similar stores destroyed by fire, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 12, after the word "trousers," to strike out "forty-two" and insert "forty;" and in line 13, after the word "caps," to strike out "forty-two cavalry dress coats, forty-two cork helmets with spikes and plumes, two bugles, and one stand of colors, including two cavalry guidons," and insert "and two trumpets;" so as to make the clause read:

Clothing, camp, and garrison equipage: Forty-two cavalry blouses, forty-two cavalry trousers, forty forage caps, and two trumpets.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 18, after the word "pattern," to strike out "fifty cartridge belts and fifty slings;" so as to make the clause read:

Ordnance and ordnance stores: Fifty sabers, fifty saber belts, fifty cavalry bridles complete, fifty Springfield carbines complete (latest pattern).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,216.34 to enable the Secretary of War to purchase the ordnance and ordnance stores called for herein, and the further sum of $308.12 to further enable the Secretary of War aforesaid to purchase the quartermaster's stores or clothing, camp, and garrison equipage mentioned and called for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUNBAR R. RANSOM.

The bill (S. 2481) to place Dunbar R. Ransom on the retired list of the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Dunbar R. Ransom, late captain in the Third Artillery of the Army, a captain in the Army, and to place him on the unlimited retired list.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LORAIN RUGGLES.

The bill (S. 307) for the relief of Lorain Ruggles was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that bill. It ought to be postponed indefinitely, as recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, unless some Senator desires its retention on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over under Rule IX.

SILK CULTURE IN THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 979) for the development and encouragement of silk culture in the United States, under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VEST. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist on his objection, but will allow the bill to go over without prejudice. It is an important bill for the development of the silk industry in this country.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to examine the bill. I do not ask to have it go over permanently but only temporarily.

Mr. VEST. I have not had time to examine the bill. Does it not create another office?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] reported the bill. I had the honor to introduce it originally, but a substitute has been reported by the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. It only provides for an expenditure of $2,000 per annum.

Mr. VEST. I should like to look at the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the bill will not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place.

PERJURY AT LAND OFFICES.

The bill (S. 2161) to provide for and to punish the crime of perjury before the United States local land offices was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in all cases where any oath, affirmation, or affidavit shall be made or taken before any register or receiver, or either, or both, of them, of any local land office of the United States or any Territory thereof, or where any oath, affirmation, or affidavit shall be made or taken before any person authorized by the laws of any State or Territory of the United States to administer oaths or affirmations, or to take affidavits, and such oaths, affirmations, or affidavits are made, used, or filed in any of said local land offices, or in the General Land Office, as well in cases arising under any or either of the orders, regulations, or instructions, concerning any of the public lands of the United States issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or other proper officer of the Government of the United States, as under the laws of the United States, in anywise relating to or affecting any right, claim, or title, or any contest therefor, to any of the public lands of the United States, and if any person or persons shall, taking such oath, affirmation, or affidavit, knowingly, willfully, or corruptly, swear or affirm falsely, the same shall be deemed and taken to be perjury, and the person or persons guilty thereof shall, upon conviction, be liable to the punishment prescribed for that offense by the laws of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. This bill is rendered necessary by reason of the effect of some recent decisions of some local courts in the West. There can be no objection to it, as it merely revives a section of law passed in 1857, which by an omission in the repealing clause in the Revised Statutes was repealed entirely, so that the character of crime described in this amendment, which is simply a recital of the old law, can not be reached in the courts. Therefore it is necessary, in order to provide for the punishment of such crimes, that this additional legislation should be had.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble, which the committee recommend be stricken out.

Mr. WILSON. The preamble should be stricken out, I think. The preamble was rejected.

CUARTEL LOT, IN MONTEREY, CAL.

The bill (S. 2599) releasing the right, title, and interest of the United States to the piece or parcel of land known as the Cuartel lot to the city of Monterey, Cal., was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation of that bill. I see the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] who reported it is present. It purports to confirm title to one particular lot, naming it, but there is such language in the body of the bill as to confirm all the public lands around Sacramento to the city. Now, if this bill is intended to confirm only title to this one lot, then we know exactly what it is, but if it is to be a sweeping and general law, we do not know what it covers.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill relates simply to a little lot that had some sort of a military establishment on it at the time Mexico was captured, and the title is disputed.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill seems to be very adroitly prepared, and appears to have been introduced by request. The language used is as follows:

That the city of Monterey, Cal., is hereby designated as the trustee of the original grant made by the Mexican Government of pueblo lands—

Not of this Cuartel lot, but of all pueblo lands. That is a little too broad. I move to strike out in line 9 the words "of pueblo lands," and then in line 10, after the word "of," to strike out "said pueblo."

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will allow this bill to go over a moment, I will look at it. It was reported and passed at the last session. I will make some inquiries about it. I think it is only intended to make the present city of Monterey the successor of the old corporation.

Mr. COCKRELL. To this lot?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. Let it go over temporarily, and I will call it up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over informally.

SOLDIERS' HOME IN KANSAS.

The bill (S. 2140) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the State of Kansas certain lands therein named for homes of old soldiers and their families, etc., was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill go over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope it may go over with the understanding that it may not lose its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. I said not to lose its place on the Calendar. There is no report with the bill. There is already a national volunteer soldiers' home in Kansas at Leavenworth, and the General Government supports these State homes by one-half contributions to them. Unless there is some very extraordinary reason, I do not see why we should establish a State home in a State where there is already a national home.

Mr. PERKINS. This bill does not provide for the establishment of a soldiers' home under the supervision of Congress, but simply donates this land to the State of Kansas that the State of Kansas may establish a home.

Mr. COCKRELL. But there is a general provision that the United States Treasury pays one-half of the expenses of the State homes, and Kansas would come in and claim that as a matter of course. There is no question on that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

SALE OF DISTRICT LOTS.

The bill (S. 2775) to provide for the sale of certain lots in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 30th ultimo approved and signed the act (S. 1415) for the relief of John Nickels.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following report; which was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 6185, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

In section 3, line 2, after the word "act," insert the words "or the acts hereby extended."

In section 4, line 2, after the word "descent," strike out the word "once."

In section 4, after the words "United States," in line 3, strike out all down to the word "shall," in line 6.

In section 4, line 7, strike out the words "six months" and insert in lieu thereof "one year."

Add new sections as follows:

"SEC. 5. That after the passage of this act, on an application to any judge or court of the United States in the first instance for a writ of habeas corpus by a Chinese person seeking to land in the United States, to whom that privilege has been denied, no bail shall be allowed, and such application shall be heard and determined promptly, without unnecessary delay.

"SEC. 6. And it shall be the duty of all Chinese laborers within the limits of the United States at the time of the passage of this act, and who are entitled to remain in the United States, to apply to the collector of internal revenue of their respective districts, within one year after the passage of this act, for a certificate of residence, and any Chinese laborer within the limits of the United States who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, or who, after one year from the passage hereof, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States, and may be arrested by any United States customs official, collector of internal revenue or his deputies, United States marshal or his deputies and taken before a United States judge, whose duty it shall be to order that he be deported from the United States, as hereinbefore provided, unless he shall establish clearly to the satisfaction of said judge that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause he has been unable to procure his certificate, and to the satisfaction of the court, and by at least one credible white witness that he was a resident of the United States at the time of the passage of this act; and if upon the hearing it shall appear that he is so entitled to a certificate, it shall be granted upon his paying the cost. Should it appear that said Chinaman had procured a certificate, which has been lost or destroyed, he shall be detained and judgment suspended a reasonable time to enable him to procure a duplicate from the officer granting it, and in such cases the costs of said arrest and trial shall be in the discretion of the court. And any Chinese person other than a Chinese laborer, having a right to be and remain in the United States, desiring such certificate as evidence of such right, may apply for and receive the same without charge.

"SEC. 7. That immediately after the passage of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the efficient execution of this act, and shall prescribe the necessary forms, and furnish the necessary blanks to enable collectors of internal revenue to issue the certificates required hereby, and make such provisions that certificates may be procured in localities convenient to the applicants. Such certificates shall be issued without charge to the applicant, and shall contain the name, age, local residence, and occupation of the applicant, and such other description of the applicant as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and a duplicate thereof shall be filed in the office of the collector of internal revenue for the district within which such Chinaman makes application.

"SEC. 8. That any person who shall knowingly and falsely alter or substitute any name for the name written in such certificate, or forge such certificate, or knowingly utter any forged or fraudulent certificate, or falsely personate any person named in such certificate, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, or imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not more than five years.

SEC. 9. The Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the payment of such compensation in the nature of fees to the collectors of internal revenue, for services performed under the provisions of this act, in addition to salaries now allowed by law, as he shall deem necessary, not exceeding the sum of $1 for each certificate issued.

And the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the title so as to read as follows: "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States."

THE CENSUS INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House a proposed order, which the Clerk will read:

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, The Committee on Census, heretofore ordered to investigate the administration of the Census Office, is authorized to discharge that duty by a subcommittee appointed by the chairman, and the expenses of the investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers to be approved by the chairman of said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the adoption of this order?

There was no objection, and the order was adopted.

TO ENCOURAGE AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7023) to encourage American shipping, and to put the bill upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to grant registers, as vessels of the United States, to such foreign-built steamships engaged in freight and passenger business, and sailing in an established line from a port in the United States, as are of a tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons, and capable of a speed of not less than 20 knots per hour, according to the existing method of Government test for speed, of which not less than 90 per cent of the shares of the capital of the foreign corporation or association owning the same was owned January 1, 1890, and has continued to be owned until the passage of this act by citizens of the United States, including as such corporations citizens created under the laws of any of the States thereof, upon the American owners of such majority interest obtaining a full and complete transfer and title to such steamships from the foreign corporations owning the same: Provided, That such American owners shall, subsequent to the date of this law, have built, or have contracted to build, in American shipyards, steamships of an aggregate tonnage of not less in amount than that of the steamships so admitted to registry.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, on being satisfied that such steamships so acquired by American citizens, or by such corporation or corporations as above set forth, are such as come within the provisions of this act, and that the American owners of such steamships, for which an American registry is to be granted under the provisions hereof, have built or contracted to build in American shipyards steamships of an aggregate tonnage as set forth in the first section hereof, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships so acquired to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district, and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector. After which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States.

SEC. 3. That no further or other inspection shall be required for the said steamship or steamships than is now required for foreign steamships carrying passengers under the existing laws of the United States, and that a special certificate of inspection may be issued for each steamship registered under this act; and that before issuing the registry to any such steamship as a vessel of the United States the collector of customs of the proper collection district shall cause such steamship to be measured and described in accordance with the laws of the United States, which measurement and description shall be recited in the certificate of registry to be issued under this act.

SEC. 4. That any steamships so registered under the provisions of this act may be taken and used by the United States as cruisers or transports upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value at the time of taking between the United States and the owners, then the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, who, in case of disagreement, shall select a third, the award of any two of the three so chosen to be final and conclusive.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. KILGORE. I demand a second.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] to control the time in favor of the bill, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] to control the time against it.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, all I desire is an explanation of the bill, so that the House may understand it.

Mr. FOWLER. This is simply a bill to grant an American register to certain vessels built in foreign countries and owned by American citizens, vessels of a certain tonnage and speed. It has been unanimously reported by the committee; no objection whatever has been made to it, and we believe that it ought to pass.

Mr. REILLY. Perhaps the gentleman had better call attention to the proviso in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; the bill contains a proviso that the American owners shall, subsequent to the date of this law, have built, or have contracted to build, in American shipyards steamships of an aggregate tonnage of not less in amount than that of the steamships so admitted to registry. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] who will give any further explanation of the bill that may be desired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], I will state that the object of this bill, to put it briefly, is to provide a customer for vessels built in American shipyards. The Inman Steamship Line is to-day controlled by American capital. The company own a large fleet of ships, two of them known as the City of New York and the City of Paris. The company would like to place all their vessels under the American flag, but they do not ask that concession from Congress at this time, nor, indeed, do they intend to ask for it at all. They desire to be permitted to come into this country as an American line and to order from American shipbuilders ships of the same size and capacity as the City of New York and the City of Paris, and the indulgence they ask is that in order to enjoy this privilege they shall not be compelled to sacrifice the two ships which have been built within the last few years at an enormous expense, and which can not be sold at more than a small percentage of their actual value because they are unavailable for any purpose except transatlantic travel.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. It seems to me that the first portion of this bill is drawn in such a manner that it will allow this company, and this company alone, to continue in this line of business, so far as it is affected by this legislation. I read a few lines of the bill:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to grant registers, as vessels of the United States, to such foreign-built steamships engaged in trade and passenger business, etc.

I do not desire to oppose the bill, but I think that if the word "now" were inserted before the word "engaged," it would obviate the objection which I have in mind.

Mr. COCKRAN. I understand that under the rules of the House it is impossible to make any amendment at this time, but I would be entirely willing to consent to any amendment which would promote the object of the bill as I have described it. That object is simply to give an opportunity to this company, or some company, upon reasonable terms to purchase ships built in our shipyards, and thus test the capacity of American shipbuilders to compete with the shipbuilders on the Clyde.

If we can show by the actual experiment of one construction that we can build vessels that can compete in speed and safety with the vessels built upon the Clyde, it is believed that a demand for American ships will arise in every maritime city on the globe, and that we shall soon become exporters of ships, instead of applicants to Congress for permission to purchase foreign-built ships.

Now, I am free to say to this House that I do not quite understand how any company can build vessels and maintain them under the American flag in competition with English-built vessels. Every shipbuilder and every shipowner with whom I have hitherto conversed has told me it is impossible to run an American ship in competition with an English vessel. But these gentlemen who now own the Inman Line declare that it is quite possible for American ingenuity and American skill to outstrip any competition in the world, and they are willing to risk their capital upon the experiment. They ask that they be permitted now to purchase ships in America without having imposed upon them the sacrifice involved in a forced sale of vessels which have recently been constructed abroad.

Mr. LOUD. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent to have the word "now" inserted?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There can not be any objection to that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman from New York will consent to that amendment. It will remove all obscurity.

Mr. COCKRAN. I certainly consent.

Mr. BLAND. Why not allow this privilege hereafter to others that may be engaged in this business? Why do you want to limit it?

Mr. COCKRAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to know the object of limiting this privilege to companies already engaged in the business. Why do you want to make a monopoly of this? Why should it not be general?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The bill is limited by its terms to a certain corporation; and the amendment suggested will simply remove an ambiguity.

Mr. COCKRAN. I did not quite comprehend the remark of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. In answer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who asks the object of having the word "now" inserted, I am saying that the bill by its terms is intended to be limited to a corporation whose shares, on the 1st of January, 1892, were, to the extent of 90 per cent, owned in this country. The insertion of the word "now" is desirable for the purpose of removing any ambiguity.

Mr. CARUTH. To what line does the proposed amendment apply?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The suggestion is to insert the word "now" before the word "engaged," in line 5; so as to read: "steamships now engaged."

Mr. COCKRAN. There is no objection to that; it does not change the meaning at all. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be amended by the insertion of the word "now" before the word "engaged," in the fifth line of the first section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] can make that change as a modification of his motion.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Why is it proposed that this privilege of free trade in ships be limited to lines now in operation?

Mr. COCKRAN. Because of the peculiar circumstances of the case; there is no other line, so far as I know, that wants to come in under the American flag under the conditions of this measure.

or any other conditions. If the bill be so drawn as to extend this privilege to all foreign lines we make it practically a free-ship bill, and thus provoke a discussion and an opposition, in the face of which we can not hope to carry the bill through both Houses. The object of this bill and of its limitation is to permit an experiment which this line is willing to undertake, and which, if successful, will have a decisive effect upon the ability of our shipbuilders to face foreign competition. If the experiment be successful it will make free ships an inevitable necessity in the sense that we will become sellers of ships instead of buyers of ships.

Mr. WATSON. Why not leave the experiment open to anybody who may choose to enter upon it?

Mr. COCKRAN. You have a free-ship bill now before this House which we can not hope to pass through both Houses.

Mr. WATSON. But can you not limit the number of ships?

Mr. COCKRAN. A bill of the character which the gentleman indicates is now pending in the House, and I hope we will have an opportunity to vote on it before the close of the session.

Mr. FOWLER. The privilege which this bill proposes to grant can extend under similar circumstances to ships belonging to any other line; there is no particular line mentioned in the bill.

The question being taken upon the motion of Mr. FOWLER as modified (the bill having been amended by inserting the word "now" before the word "engaged," in line 5, section 1), it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

So the bill was passed.

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

Mr. MOSES. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7296) granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1857, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States, who served for thirty days in the Black Hawk war, the Creek war, the Cherokee disturbances, or the Florida war with the Seminole Indians, embracing a period from 1832 to 1857, inclusive, and were honorably discharged, and such other officers, soldiers, and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress, for any specific service in said Indian wars, although their term of service may have been less than thirty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any person not a citizen of the United States.

SEC. 2. That pensions under this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, and payable from and after the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto.

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension roll under this act, proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, of the right of the applicant to a pension; and any person who shall falsely and corruptly take any oath required under this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension roll the name of any person whenever it shall be made to appear by proof satisfactory to him that such name was placed upon such roll through false and fraudulent representations, and that such person is not entitled to a pension under this act. The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other evidence of service performed and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient.

SEC. 4. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month.

SEC. 5. That the pension laws now in force, which are not inconsistent or in conflict with this act, are hereby made a part of this act, so far as they may be applicable thereto.

SEC. 6. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed, so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HERMANN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire to offer an amendment extending the benefits of this act to survivors of the Indian wars of 1855 and 1856. Would such an amendment be now in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Could not the bill be amended by unanimous consent so as to include the survivors of the Indian wars of 1855, 1856, and 1857, in Washington and Oregon? They are just as much entitled to pensions as those who were engaged in the Seminole wars.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is a motion to suspend all rules and put the bill which has been read upon its passage. It does not carry with it the right of amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I know that, Mr. Speaker, but a few moments ago in order to get a homeopathic dose of new ships, or free ships, by consent an amendment was put on in the shape of an additional word to a pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman himself made the motion to put it in. Of course the gentleman making the motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill can move to pass it with an amendment.

The first question is on ordering a second.

Mr. MOSES. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] to control the time respectively for and against the bill.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Georgia, to ask if he would agree to authorize an amendment to this bill, extending it so as to include the Indian survivors of the war of 1855-'56? If that amendment is incorporated in the bill it will meet the hearty approval of all persons in that Western section of the country, and I will say in addition that memorials have come up from the Legislative Assemblies of all of these States, memorials have come before the committee from Indian Veterans' Associations, and individuals interested in this matter; and I will say to the gentleman that for all that vast portion of the American Union of the Northwest, embracing nearly one-fourth of our entire Union, we are indebted largely to the efforts of these men, the survivors of whom we are asking this relief for at this time. They were brave men and rendered gallant service.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is certainly occupying somebody's time.

Mr. HERMANN. I was asking consent of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MOSES. In reply to the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. Speaker, I will state that the bill which has just been read was considered by the Committee on Pensions, and unanimously reported; and as a member of that committee I would state that the provisions of the bill to which he refers, or such an amendment as has been suggested by the gentleman from Oregon, has not been presented to the committee or considered by them.

I have no idea but that the committee would be willing to consider such a bill. I understand the policy of the Government is not to give service pensions until after the lapse of a greater number of years than have elapsed since the wars of 1855, 1856, and 1857. The men who served in 1836 are twenty years older than those who served in the wars to which the gentleman refers. I do not state this as an objection by any means to letting these men come in, but to suggest, as we can not materially amend the bill now, that such a provision should come in as an independent proposition and stand upon its own merits.

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman will permit me a word in that direction, I would like to state that such a provision as I desire to have incorporated here has been considered by your Committee on Pensions, and the committee concluded that it could not consent to go any further than the provision which is fixed in the bill now before us for consideration. But inasmuch as this bill now before us was reported by the committee some four or five years ago, it occurred to me that it would be proper to have this other feature, which is simply one of justice, incorporated in the bill for the benefit of the veterans of these Indian wars.

Mr. MOSES. In reply to the gentleman from Oregon, I think it would be better to have these bills considered separately. We tried to get this bill on the Mexican veterans' bill in the shape of an amendment, but it was rejected by the House, and that bill was passed on its own merits. It is but fair that the soldiers engaged in each war should stand on their own merits in regard to pensions.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MOSES. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Here is the condition exactly. The attempt to secure pensions for the veterans of the Indian wars of 1855, 1856, and 1857—these men residing in the States west of the Mississippi, in Oregon, Washington, and California—

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point of order on this colloquy. I understand that the time has been regulated by the Speaker.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I only want to suggest, with the gentleman's consent—I know the gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor—but that it is in his power to agree to an amendment which will include these men in the bill.

Mr. MOSES. It will take unanimous consent to let it go in.

Mr. HERMANN. But the gentleman can put it in by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the point of order of the gentleman from Texas is undoubtedly well taken. But we were endeavoring to convince the gentleman from Georgia that he had it in his power to do justice to the soldiers of the Indian wars just to the same extent as justice is now proposed to be done to the soldiers of these other wars who live mostly in the South. The same principle applies to both.

Mr. HERMANN. Exactly.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. And we think the two cases are identically the same in regard to merit.

Mr. HERMANN. The merits are precisely the same.

Mr. MOSES. I will state to the gentleman that he can ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I ask unanimous consent that the provisions of this bill be amended so as also to include the veterans of the Indian wars of 1855 and 1856.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the House to alter the bill by amendment. Under the rules, on the third Monday of each month the Chair can recognize individual members to move to suspend all the rules and to put a bill on its passage. When a bill is so presented and the motion made it is not amendable, but the gentleman himself who submits the motion may ask that the bill be amended. It is not amendable on motion.

Mr. HERMANN. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it will be agreeable to the gentleman to accept this as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That can not be done.

Mr. MOSES. I said I would not object, but I will not ask unanimous consent for the amendment.

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman says he will not object, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can, if he himself desires, add it to the bill on his own motion. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask him if he will kindly accept this as an amendment?

Mr. HEARD. This bill is the work of the committee and you individually can not add to it.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Pensions I do not think it is in my discretion or that I really have the right to accept the amendment.

Mr. HEARD. Of course you have not.

Mr. MOSES. The amendment is a very important one, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN] that he bring in a separate bill covering the soldiers of the wars named.

Mr. HERMANN. But why can not the gentleman accept this amendment?

Mr. MOSES. Because we have not considered it in the committee.

Mr. HERMANN. It is a common cause. The merits of the two propositions are identically the same. These people who were engaged in the Indian wars of 1855-'56 are just as much entitled to this legislation as are the others.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose it is necessary for me to explain the bill. Everybody in the House is fully acquainted with its object.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman how many pensioners he estimates, or how many it has been estimated by the committee, would be placed upon the pension rolls by virtue of this act?

Mr. MOSES. The highest possible number can not be over five thousand. I do not think it can possibly reach that number, because in estimating the number now living according to mortality tables no account was taken of the number of these soldiers who were killed or died in the civil war, or of the unusual death rate attending the close of the Indian wars. For instance, the report says that fully one-third of these men came home from the Indian wars sick, and the death rate was a great deal higher than the ordinary rate in the country. But taking the ordinary mortality tables, and making no allowance for the increased death rate, or for the casualties occurring in the last war, the highest possible number can not be over five thousand.

Mr. BUSHNELL. And the proposition is to pension these men.

Mr. MOSES. And a great many of these men have already been placed upon the pension rolls. Now, the Pension Committee, Friday night after Friday night, report these individual cases, and there is a universal demand upon both sides of the House that instead of taking up the time of the House in passing special bills for individuals we should put all of these old men upon the same footing and place them upon the pension rolls. The average age of these men is about 84 years, and their expectancy of life is less than three years.

Mr. BUSHNELL. The pensions are to begin when?

Mr. MOSES. At the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This does not go backward.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The gentleman states in his argument that these men are dying off rapidly, that they are getting very old, and I sympathize with him and am heartily in favor of the bill; but why was it not made applicable to the same class of people who fought in the later Indian wars, who are getting old, who are dying off rapidly, who are very small in numbers, who have rendered valuable services to the country, just as valuable as those rendered by the men who are to be the beneficiaries of this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There was no bill brought before the committee to include the others.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Yes, there is a bill before the committee, and it has been before them some time. Why were they not all provided for at one time? It would have been very easy to bring in a bill that would do justice to men of all sections and engaged in all the old Indian wars, men who have done so much to make possible the civilization of the country.

Mr. MOSES. The gentleman's question has nothing to do with the merits of this bill. I do not discuss the merits of the bill to which he refers, but the men he is talking about were engaged in a different war, twenty years later, and the men who are provided for by this bill are 20 years older than the others. These men have had to wait until they are now 84 years old. I suppose the only objection is that the others are not old enough yet.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. They are pretty old—65 and 70 years old—and they endured just as great hardships and privations as the others did. One word more. All we are trying to do is to convince the gentleman and the members of the committee that what is sauce for his goose is sauce for our gander.

Mr. MOSES. I suggest to the gentleman that he ought to have come before the Committee on Pensions and there made the speech that he is now making here.

Mr. HERMANN. We did that.

Mr. MOSES. The committee which considered this bill was a full committee, Republicans and Democrats, and there was no suggestion made in connection with these other soldiers.

Mr. HERMANN. I will say to the gentleman that he is mistaken about that, because the bill I refer to was considered by the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. Suppose these men are drawing pensions under another law. How are they affected?

Mr. MOSES. They can not draw another pension. That is provided for.

Mr. HEARD. If my friend will allow me, I think I can simplify this trouble.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion in the Hall that we can not understand what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The House will be in order, and gentlemen in the rear of the seats will please cease conversation.

Mr. MOSES. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I rose to say that I think I can simplify the situation a little. This bill can only be amended by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] properly states that he has no right to accept this amendment for his committee. I want to say now that if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] were willing to accept the amendment, I would feel obliged to object.

I do not believe we should burden this bill, which is designed to embrace only the soldiers of the old Indian wars, with an amendment which makes it include the survivors of the later Indian wars. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] has correctly stated, on every individual application coming here from these old soldiers a pension is granted by private bill; and such being the case, there is every propriety in our passing a general act covering all these cases, and save the time of Congress in legislating on individual bills. Besides, if it be right to grant this relief when applied for in individual cases we should let the relief be given in such form as to reach all entitled to it, at the same time and in the same measure. As we have been legislating by private acts there is no uniformity in amount granted, and while none are given less than $8 per month, some go as high as $20 per month.

A great many of these veterans are provided for now by private act. This is to put these soldiers of the old Indian wars on the same footing as the Mexican veterans, giving them a service pension of $8 a month. The reason why the soldiers in other Indian wars are not thus provided for is because it is not so long since those wars closed. Besides that, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many Indian wars. There was the Ogoi Indian war, the Nevada Indian wars, the California Indian war, and there were also the Indian wars in Colorado and Idaho, in which the character and length of service materially differed, and some of which occurred at comparatively recent dates.

Mr. HERMANN. Why not include them?

Mr. HEARD. I am opposed to including them in this bill, and therefore I should object if the gentleman from Georgia felt compelled to accept the amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. You are not opposed to including those soldiers who were in the Indian wars up to 1851?

Mr. HEARD. I am opposed to considering them in connection with this measure. As to what I should do on that, as a separate proposition, when it comes before the House, I would then be able to declare, and I would base my action in the case on the facts then presented.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The conditions are perfectly similar.

Mr. KYLE. I think a great deal of the confusion, Mr. Speaker, comes from the rear.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen in the rear of the seats will please cease conversation, or retire to the cloak room.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time to my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] as he may desire to consume.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the gentleman who reports the bill what will be the effect of repealing section 4716 upon pensioners who have heretofore been dropped from the rolls on account of disloyalty? Do I understand that this bill will restore them to their rights, and that back pay will be granted to them? If it does, I would like to vote for the bill.

Mr. MOSES. It is not that way. The fact that any claimant shall have been a soldier in the Confederacy does not operate as a bar under this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. But you repeal section 4716.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; but at the end of the section it says "it is hereby repealed so far as it relates to this act, or to pensioners under this act."

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish the gentleman would have that section read.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will send up the section to be read. What I desire to know especially is, I understand quite a number of people who have been allowed pensions were allowed pensions before the war for services in the Creek war, but under section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, their names were dropped from the roll. Now, I want to know if the repeal of that statute will allow these old people to collect the pensions which have been due them since 1861?

Mr. MOSES. I think undoubtedly they could not. By reading the section, it will be seen, that it says:

That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act, or to pensioners under this act.

Relating to this act. That has nothing whatever to do with others.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the section be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. LANHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. MOSES. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. LANHAM. Suppose this bill should pass, would not its effect be simply to put these survivors of the Indian wars on the same footing and give them the same pensionable status that the Mexican war veterans now have?

Mr. MOSES. Precisely the same; but there is no provision by which any person who has previously been upon the rolls and has been dropped can receive back pension under this act. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KILGORE. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILGORE. Such time as he may desire.

Mr. POWERS. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that it is in order by unanimous consent to propose an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. POWERS. Then I have nothing to say. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. PATTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether this is intended to be a service pension or a pension dependent upon disability.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is a service pension.

Mr. MOSES. The average age of those men is now 84 years, and I suppose they are all disabled by extreme old age, and incapable of manual labor; but as a matter of fact, it is a service pension.

Mr. PATTON. I see that it is provided that they shall furnish proof that they are entitled to the pension under the law; now, what I desire to know is, whether they are required to prove disability?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I suppose they have simply got to prove that they were soldiers; and as they are all old, they are to be pensioned on the ground that anybody who has arrived at that age is supposed to be disabled from manual labor.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that this bill includes all Indian wars, in the North as well as in the South? The gentleman from Washington seemed to intimate that the bill proposed payment of pensions only to soldiers who had been in Indian wars in the South.

Mr. KILGORE. I will yield to any gentleman who desires to make a speech; I do not. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KILGORE. I will.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I find that the speech of the gentleman from the State of Washington is creating the impression that this bill provides only for pensions in Indian wars which were fought by soldiers from the Southern States. This is a great error. It is important that I call attention to the fact that this bill is not confined to soldiers who were in the Indian wars in the South. It includes the Black Hawk war fought for the most part in Illinois, one of the most severe Indian wars of the century, and it includes all Indian wars from 1832 to 1842.

Mr. SNODGRASS. It simply provides that the pensions shall be paid to survivors in that portion of the country that furnished the soldiers.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And that applies to the North as well as the South. If it is true that citizens of Southern States will predominate as beneficiaries in this bill it is because those States furnished soldiers with great liberality to fight the wily Indian foe, but it is also true that the people of the Southern States furnished a very large proportion of the soldiers who won for us the conquest of Mexico in the brilliant campaigns led by Scott and Taylor, and it is also true that the South, with the same unselfish liberality, furnished far above her quota in every war with foreign foes, and the record of the killed and wounded on every field where they engaged testifies to their courage and heroism, and should conflicts come with any nation, now or hereafter, the Southern soldier will be found in the van of every battle.

The bill is the same measure which has been before this body for many years. I have prepared and introduced a similar bill during every Congress of which I have had the honor to be a member.

I have felt a deep interest in this matter. I have been before the Pension Committee in this and former Congresses. The bill before us is substantially the bill No. 2610, which I prepared and introduced at the beginning of this Congress.

A bill similar to this was at one time attached to the bill to pension our Mexican heroes, but the friends of the bill finally consented that the measures should be separated, upon the assurance that the provision which pensioned the soldiers of the Indian wars should have prompt consideration; and in compliance with that implied contract the Pension Committee of every Congress since 1887 has reported favorably a bill of this kind. Another erroneous impression prevails as to the number of the veterans of these wars who still remain among us. A careful estimate made by the Pension Office shows that the total number who served in those wars more than twenty days was 44,128.

As this bill requires a service of thirty days it would probably reduce the number to not exceeding 40,000. The average age of these veterans was about 30, so that the few who are now living who served in 1832 would now average about 90 years of age; and those who served in 1842 would, upon the same estimate average 80 years of age. Therefore, a general average of the age of the soldiers included in this bill would be about 85 years. Certainly no one will oppose giving a meager pension to such venerable men who fought so bravely for their country fifty or sixty years ago.

As to the number of persons who will be affected by this bill it is very easy to make an approximate computation; and according to the rules of survivorship adopted by the Pension Office and by insurance companies we can hardly hope that more than 4,000 of these brave men are now on earth, and assuming that about the same number of widows survive, there would not be more than about 8,000 altogether, and it is evident that very few of them can survive more than four or five years.

Then, again, we must remember that very many of the soldiers who fought in these Indian wars were also soldiers in the war with Mexico, and as all of these are already pensioned they are not beneficiaries in this bill, as the bill specially excludes them.
